Some have referred to this question upon party grounds. I would not intrude the question of party politics into this matter except for the fact that so long as there is a party objection, thrown by any person or persons in this country, against the just claims of the Union soldiers of the late war of the rebellion, some one responding to patriotic duty must stand forth to speak in their support and behalf.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. McCLELLAN] on yesterday spent considerable time in telling us how much the present Administration has done for the old soldiers of the country. I will not enter into a denial of any statement made in his remarks, but I submit, Mr. Chairman, without passing upon their correctness or incorrectness, that he would have found a much broader subject if he had undertaken to tell this committee what the present Administration has not done for the old soldier; in fact, if he had taken up the task of telling us what it has done against them. In that event, the words "rejection," "suspension," "reduction," and "discontinuance," as if by force would have stood out in clear relief to challenge the correctness of his statement at every word and every sentence and every thought as they fell from his lips. I do not claim that the Republican party alone possesses all the patriotism there is in this country; but no one can truthfully deny that it has always been a patriotic party. I appeal to the history of the past thirty years; I appeal to the records of Congress to bear forth the vindication and the truth of the statement that the Republican party has always stood loyally to the support of the just claims of the Union soldiers.

In the discussion of this matter, Mr. Chairman, we ought to take into account the broad range of patriotic sentiment that should thoroughly imbue the citizenship of this country, East, West, North, and South. Our patriotism as members, whatever our party affiliations may be, our patriotism as American citizens—a plane which is higher than party—should lead us in these later years to exhibit in the enactment of the laws of this nation a patriotism commensurate with that which actuated the rank and file of the Union Army. We should stand forth to show gratitude, not simply in words but in deeds, written upon the statute books of the country, carrying temporal relief to the men and women, in the hour of their temporal need, who, in the hour of the nation's need, bore the full measure of its relief and laid upon the altar of their country their best services, their best thought, and their highest devotion.

Let us, Mr. Chairman, rise above party lines, join hands on both sides of this House, and place before the country an example showing clearly and distinctly that, more than thirty years after the close of the war, fraternal peace, fraternal union, and fraternal gratitude bind together the citizens of this country, North, South, East, and West, as a reunited country. Let us forget the bitterness of the past, and always insisting that the Union forces were right and forever right and that by virtue of their victories we have a reunited country of magnificent proportions, of immeasurable power and possibility, let us unite in one glad acclaim, saying:

My country, 'tis of thee,
Sweet land of liberty,
Of thee I sing:
Land where my fathers died,
Land of the pilgrims' pride,
From every mountain-side
Let freedom ring.

[Applause.]

Mr. BURTON of Missouri. The survivors of the Army and Navy of the Union do not demand extravagance in pension legislation, nor do they demand looseness in the construction thereof, but they do insist that all pension legislation shall be construed, administered, and enforced in the spirit which prompted its enactment, to the end that not one of them living shall, either by disease or misfortune, be compelled to live beneath the roof of the almshouse, or, dying, be laid at rest within the unconsecrated limits of the potter's field.

I am not here, Mr. Chairman, to enter into a discussion which shall involve crimination or recrimination. I accept it as true that the laws now upon the statute books have not received the construction, have not been administered and enforced, in the spirit in which they were enacted, and this bill, while it does not go to the end or the limit which I desire, yet does cure or will cure in many respects the evils that now exist in the administration or enforcement of the pension laws.

This bill may be said to treat of this subject in four particulars: First, as to the personnel of those entitled to pensions; second, to the declarations of applications therefor; third, to the method and degree of proof required; and fourth, in relation to the discontinuance of pensions that have been heretofore granted.

Sections 1 and 13 amend the existing laws so as to admit to the benefits of those laws a certain class of soldiers who are not now entitled to pensions. I confess that they do not meet with my approbation. I will admit that there are existing evils which these sections attempt and will in a measure overcome and rectify; but in my judgment, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the sections are too broad, in this, that they will permit men to obtain pensions thereunder who are in no wise entitled to pensions.

The first section of the bill directly permits anyone to obtain a pension, although he may have rendered service in the Confederate army. I listened to the suggestion of my friend the gentleman from east Tennessee [Mr. GIBSON] on yesterday, and it was full of meat and merit. I recognize the fact that there were quite a number of men who were conscripted into the Confederate service and who at some subsequent period enlisted and were mustered into the service of the Union and rendered gallant service to the flag and the country. I say to him that every such a one is entitled to or ought to be entitled to a pension. I concede that. But, Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that every man who served in the Union Army, although he may have received therefrom an honorable discharge, should receive a pension; and I refer particularly to a number of regiments that some five or six months before the close of the war were enlisted and mustered out of the prisons at Indianapolis and Chicago; of men who preferred, rather than remain in the prison in Chicago or Indianapolis, to accept service under the Union flag out upon the Plains. I say not a single man of that kind or character ought to be permitted to draw a pension under this bill or any other law upon the statute books. I shall not indicate such an amendment as I would offer. My seat mate, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CONNOLLY], has brought to the consideration of this subject a careful scrutiny and analysis, and at the proper time he will offer an amendment to this first section which, in my honest judgment, will remove from it the evil to which I now call your attention; and when that amendment shall have been presented by my friend from Illinois I shall vote for it, and I hope that every other old soldier upon the floor of the House will vote for it.

The thirteenth section, Mr. Chairman, is objectionable in this, that a fair construction of the thirteenth section will permit deserters and bounty jumpers to obtain a pension. We all know that in the earlier days of the war there was either no bounty or a very small bounty. We also know that in the latter days of the war, when the draft was on, that large and liberal bounties were offered, and it is a notorious fact that there were a large number of men who deserted from existing organizations and enlisted in other organizations, prompted by the fact that by doing so they would obtain the enormous bounties that were then being offered for recruits. I believe that every such man ought to be shut out, and I hope that the thirteenth section will be amended so as to provide against the contingency of any bounty jumper obtaining a pension under the provisions of this act. My friend from Illinois has also drafted an amendment which I think squarely cures that evil. I shall vote for that amendment, and I sincerely hope that it will receive the unanimous support of the members upon the floor of this House.

The second subject-matter to which I desire to call the attention of the House is that provided for in section 14, which relates to the declaration or application for pension. The lawyers upon the floor of this House will all understand what I mean when I call their attention to the "doctrine of variance." We all know that in the trial of a case in the courts, either civil or criminal, if the proof offered does not conform to the allegation contained in the pleadings or in the indictment it can not be received. That doctrine now holds in the Pension Department in the administration of the law of June 27, 1890. So far as the law of July, 1862, is concerned, the rule is correct; because in order to obtain a pension under the law of 1862 it is necessary that the person shall prove that his disability was of service origin; that is, incurred in the line of his duty; and, therefore, of necessity his declaration should set out with particularity the disease, injury, or disability upon which he bases his claim for a pension; but the act of June 27, 1890, confers upon a soldier the right to a pension if he shall have honorably served for ninety days or more and shall be so disabled as to be unable to earn his support by manual labor.

Now, if he be so disabled that he can not earn his support by manual labor, and the disability is not due to his vicious or criminal habits, why should he be required to name with particularity the disability of which he may be suffering? In other words, Mr. Chairman, supposing that the soldier is absolutely disabled from earning his support by manual labor, he alleges in his declaration that his disabilities are due to disease of the lungs. The medical examination shows that his lungs are sound, and yet it shows that the man is not able to earn his support by reason of some disease of the liver or of the kidneys. I ask you is there any reason in the world why that man should be refused a pension? Every man upon the floor of this House will say "No." The fourteenth section of this law does away with the doctrine of variance, by providing that all that is requisite shall be simply a declaration of disability that prevents him from earning his support by manual labor.

As to those sections which change the nature and degree of proof, I do not know that I particularly care to tax the time and attention of this body. As to the sections which relate to those whose pensions have been discontinued or dropped, I clearly think that the specific provisions of this bill not only ought to be adopted, but that they ought to be rigidly enforced. The gentleman from New York [Mr. McCLELLAN], in the presentation of his views on yesterday, took the position that quite a number of those who were borne upon the pension rolls had been placed there by reason of a certain order, No. 164, that that order was wrong, based upon wrong principles, and that when the Department abandoned the principles of the order then those who had been placed on the roll during the operation of that order ought to come off. I think not. I stated in the beginning, Mr. Chairman, that the survivors of the Army and Navy of the Union do not demand a loose construction of the law, but they do demand fair and honorable treatment.

Mr. Chairman, I call the attention of the Committee of the Whole to this fact: In every court in all this broad land and in every tribunal of justice in the whole civilized world any individual who stands before that tribunal charged with the commission of a crime or an offense is presumed to be innocent until he shall have been proven guilty beyond all reasonable doubt. I care not though he who stands there be a man whose reputation is of the worst in the community in which he lives. I care not though his lineaments be furrowed with crime, even though he bear the mark of Cain upon his brow, the crystallized intelligence of the nineteenth century throws around that man the presumption of innocence, and he continues to be guarded by that presumption until his guilt is clearly proved.

Now, I say to my friend from New York and to every member upon this floor that when, in conformity to the law and the requirements of the rules of the Pension Department, an old soldier has proved his claim and his name has been placed upon the pension roll, he ought at least to have the benefit of the presumption which the law throws around the person of even the vilest criminal. That same privilege, that same protection, ought to be given to the old and decrepit defender of his country and its flag. [Applause.] The survivors of the Army and Navy of the Union declare and maintain that the pension roll is a roll of honor, and if there be thereon a single name that has been put upon it by mistake, by false representation, by fraud, or by perjury, they say let it come off.

But, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, it ought not to come off upon a mere charge made by somebody who is unwilling to put his name to the charge and back it up by his oath. Much less ought it to come off because of a charge contained in a simple anonymous communication. What the old soldiers demand is this, that if there be in all this land a Government official or taxpayer, a man who thinks, or claims, or maintains, that the name of any old soldier is wrongfully upon the pension list, that man shall make his charge fairly and openly; that the soldier shall be given notice thereof; that after notice is duly given there shall be an open, fair, and complete adjudication of the whole question; and if, upon such trial, upon such a hearing, it shall be found that the soldier's name has been wrongfully placed upon the pension roll, he will consent and his comrades will consent that that name shall come off. But until that showing has been made the old soldier demands that the presumption which, as I have heretofore said, this great Government and all other civilized governments throw around the person of the vilest person that lives in a community shall also be extended to him, and that he shall not be struck down unjustly and without a fair hearing.

Mr. Chairman, there are quite a number of existing evils which this bill seeks to correct: In relation to marriage, in relation to divorce, in relation to several things. The spirit of the bill is right, and, over and above and beyond it, in addition to the two specific amendments to which I have directed attention to-day concerning the first and thirteenth sections, I sincerely hope that this committee will vote to incorporate into this bill the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN]. I stand here to declare that right and justice, humanity and patriotism, demand that every enactment upon our statute books concerning pensions shall be liberally construed in favor of the claimant, to the end that he who bore the burden, he who donned the uniform of the nation in its hour of difficulty and danger, when he shall have become old and decrepit, may be protected not only in his person but in his family and in his home. [Loud applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I thank the committee for their attention.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, the report that introduced this measure to the House states that "the bill adds no new class of pensioners as such to the pension roll." In view of this fact, there can certainly be no objection to its consideration from the standpoint of the need for some legislation in aid of the administration of the pension laws. However meritorious legislation that adds to the rolls any worthy class of pensioners, and however meritorious any measure that may aid any class of pensioners may be, yet the time has come, in my judgment, when we can afford to step aside from such classes of legislation and consider a purely administrative bill that has for its object simply a safe adjustment of all matters pending before the Pension Bureau and the security of all pensions that have thus far been adjudicated.

This bill does not contain all that I might select, even in the line in which it is drawn, neither does it contain some things that in my judgment are essential to complete a just administration of the laws on the statute books. Yet it does contain so much of merit, so much that will expedite the work already in progress, and so much that will add safety and security to the adjudicated pensions, that it meets my most hearty approval in every respect.

While all that has been done by Congress in aid of the veterans of the late war has prompted most careful consideration, and in many instances, through the sympathies that have been aroused, created most liberal laws, that have brought comfort and relief to the wounded and stricken in health, and consolation and ease to the widows and orphans of deceased soldiers, yet, in my judgment, there is at least one part of this bill that in point of importance is of equal import to any law that has been enacted by Congress in aid or support of pension legislation.

I refer to sections 2 and 4, that undertake to fix a title to pensions already adjudicated and that may hereafter be passed upon by the Department.

In the past it has been thought that when once a claimant had gone through the minute and sometimes intricate rules of the Department, complying with their demands in all particulars, and had at last received an allowance that gave to him an annual pension, that there was an end to his further anxiety, and to him, at least, was secured during the remainder of his life the amount fixed by the certificate issued by the Department. It was thought by all that no further legislation would be needed to guarantee to the pensioner the allowance that the great Bureau had, after many months and sometimes years of investigation, at last determined upon, and that such an amount as fixed by that Bureau would be considered by the Government as a claim against it so long as the holder of that certificate should be in life. But it has been left to recent years, under changed circumstances, to demonstrate that dangerous rulings under existing laws may be so exercised as to entirely overcome the presumptions that had existed in favor of an adjusted claim. Not until the decision in the Bennett case, in May, 1893, was it ever dreamed that without further legislation by Congress the Pension Department could of its own motion re-investigate and reexamine claims that had once been passed upon and order a discontinuance or suspension of the same. But after that decision had been made and the present Secretary of the Interior had organized his "board of revision," thousands of claims already adjudicated, and, so far as any person had dreamed before May, 1893, were forever put at rest, not to be changed save upon the death of the claimants, when their various accounts should be closed, were reconsidered and suspended.

The exact data of the number of claims thus considered by that famous "board of revision" can not be obtained, but, without going into the details and giving a full and complete statement of the same, it is sufficient for the purpose of this argument to notice simply those that have occurred within recent months. As shown by the report of the Commissioner of Pensions for the year ended June 30, 1895, there were dropped from the pension roll during that year 42,411 pensions. Those pensions are divided into classes—so many dropped on account of death, so many for remarriage, so many for minors who had obtained the legal limitations, and so many by failure to claim the pension. But all the others, being 9,680, are grouped into one class and noted by the Commissioner as having been dropped "for other causes," without stating what those "other causes" were; and it is safe to claim that those pensions so dropped, without identifying the exact nature of the claims or the reasons for their suspension, were simply dropped on the order of the Commissioner; otherwise there would certainly have been enumerated in his report some reason for his action.

In a subsequent report from the Bureau, in answer to the request of the Senate of the United States, the Commissioner reports that from the 1st day of July, 1895, to the 1st day of January, 1896, there were dropped from the roll 31,113 pensions, and in this late report, as in the former to which I have alluded, these pensions were classified; and under the head of "For other causes," the Commissioner notes that there were suspended during this period of six months 4,826 pensions, making the total suspension for the eighteen months ending January 1, 1896, 14,506. Fourteen thousand five hundred and six pensions suspended within a period of eighteen months for "other causes." It must be remembered that through all the pension legislation of this Government, the method and procedure of the Department has been of an ex parte character, wherein the claimant was permitted to file such application as he desired under the rules and regulations stipulated by the Department itself; after which the claim rested completely and entirely in charge of the officers of the Bureau, who, following out regulations prescribed by the Department in harmony with the laws that then existed, and at such times as they desired, passed upon the evidence that was submitted under their various rules, and either rejected the claim or made allowance therefor. There is no procedure known to the statute or common law that was and is as complete and searching as the method of procedure prescribed by the Bureau of Pensions of this Government. That procedure enables the most searching investigation under all varying conditions, and permits the officers of the Department unlimited time and means to make such investigation.

All evidence is filed subject to the approval of this Bureau and passed upon by its officers in star-chamber sessions, without the presence of the claimant or any of his representatives, and when his claim has been once rejected, after the allowance of an appeal to the Secretary of the Interior, his rights are forever concluded and his one salvation is to begin anew the effort that after long and laborious trial has resulted in failure. If, instead of rejection, his claim is allowed, after every avenue known to the Bureau has been traveled and every phase of the question completely exhausted, I believe, as all believed until the decision of May, 1893, that that allowance forever fixed the title to that pension in the individual to whom it had been granted. But it seems that under the recent dangerous rules of the Department, that give to this same Bureau the right to reopen at pleasure and examine any claim, reduce a rating, or suspend a pension, it becomes necessary that the legislative power of the Government be invoked to establish a line beyond which even this Bureau can not go, and forever put at rest the fear that has arisen that all pensions are in jeopardy.

Let us for a moment consider the various roads that a claim for pension must needs travel before it can culminate in an allowance. There are six different boards to which a claim may go, and five boards to which a claim must go before its final determination. After the formal filing of an application, it is at once referred to the adjudicating division, where it is charged out to an examiner, who, after obtaining the military record of the claimant and passing upon the formal matter of the application and the order of evidence, in the event evidence has at that time been filed, directs an examination by the board of examining surgeons. This constitutes the second board. Evidence is then called for, if not already filed, and examined to the satisfaction of the examiner in whose hands the claim rests, who thereupon submits the claim to the board of review. Not content thus far, after having been presented to three boards, the member of the board of review who receives the claim passes upon it under the various rules of the Department, and refers the same to the board of rereview, where it undergoes its fourth examination. All cases involving a medical question then pass from this board of review to the medical board. It must be remembered that at any stage of this investigation the claim may be at any time ordered into the field for special examination, so that where a claim is specially examined there are absolutely five separate and distinct examinations before final action thereon; and where a claim involves a medical question, there are six separate and distinct examinations of it.

Each board is a check upon the other, and if at any stage of the investigation it fails to meet the requirements of the law under the rulings of the Department as viewed by the board in whose hands it may then be found, the claim goes no further, but dies. If, for instance, in the original adjudicating division it is discovered by the examiner that some technical defect exists in the record of the soldier, as disclosed by the report from the War Department, the investigation ceases until the soldier can by his own acts correct his record. If a soldier is fortunate enough to have that record complete and satisfactory and yet the evidence upon his physical condition as shown by the board of examining surgeons does not satisfy the examiner, then the investigation stops and the claim is rejected. If perchance the claim has been sufficiently strong to pass through these early stages of its travels and goes to the board of review and the examiner of it is not satisfied upon all the evidence that has been filed, both medical and otherwise, then investigation ceases and the claim is rejected. But even if it meets the favor of the examiner in this board and seems to conform with the rules of the Department, and by him is passed to the board of rereview, which has no fuller powers than he, but does not meet the satisfaction of this fourth board, then the investigation ceases and the claim dies. So it is evident from the history of every claim that has passed through the various boards that it must necessarily meet the approval of each board in the successive stages of its progress or else it fails.

Is it strange that the thought had arisen in the minds of our people that when a claim had passed through so intricate a procedure, and had met with favor at the hands of so many investigators, that it was at an end, and that the pensioner could rest secure in the thought that he need have no further anxiety concerning it? And is it any further wonder that astonishment, dismay, anxiety, and disturbance arose when it was announced by the ruling of this Department that, notwithstanding so thorough and complete and satisfactory an investigation of the claim, at any time and under any and all circumstances the Pension Bureau holds the right to reinvestigate a claim and reduce the rating or suspend the same entirely? It is because of this anxiety and disturbance that sections 2 and 4 have been incorporated in the pending bill, and inasmuch as these sections were incorporated at my suggestion, being in substance the same as a separate bill that had been introduced by me and by my consent and approval incorporated in this bill, I desire to direct especial attention to them.

The first clause of section 2 of this bill was, in substance, originally a part of what is known as section 4, and in order to bring the two sections together for consideration I desire to read this first clause and connect it with section 4 in order to clearly show that these two sections taken together undertake to establish a title to all pensions already adjudicated or that may hereafter be determined. This will read as follows:

That from and after the passage of this act no pension heretofore granted or which may hereafter be granted under the pension law shall be reduced or discontinued except for fraud, clerical error, mistake of facts, or recovery from disability.

That hereafter in the administration of the pension laws all investigation into the merits of any pension previously allowed shall be by question and answer, under oath, in open session, after due notice to the person or persons who may be affected thereby to be present personally or by attorney; and such person or persons shall have the right to cross-examine, and a fair and full opportunity to rebut or substantiate any facts alleged or disputed: Provided, That when fraud is alleged the allegations shall be reduced to writing and under oath, and the person or persons affected thereby shall be furnished with a certified copy of the charges made, together with the names of the persons making the same, at least thirty days prior to such investigation, and shall be furnished with the names of the witnesses by whom the said charges are to be proved at least five days prior to their examination, such investigation to be conducted at the county seat of the county in which the person affected resides, and the depositions of witnesses residing outside of said county shall be taken as near as may be in accordance with the practice of the State or Territory in which said witnesses reside.

The enactment of this law will, in my judgment, establish absolute title to all pensions already adjudicated and that may be hereafter favorably determined. It has been common to speak of the title of a pension as a vested right; but no matter what it is called, the title is, after all, the thing to be desired. Some courts have held—and as yet the question is undetermined by our highest court—that a pension is not a vested right, and for this reason it is not deemed advisable to undertake by the terms of this bill to declare it to be a vested right. But if language can be definite and in terms clearly establish the title to a pension, it does not matter whether we undertake to declare the pension to be a vested right or not; but let that matter remain still as it is, because, after all, the thing that is to be desired is to put an end to the controversies that have arisen and forever establish the security and safety of a pension to the soldier by fixing the title in him.

After more than thirty years have passed, and after the claimant has exhausted all means known to him to discover the best evidence upon which to rest his claim, and it has at last been allowed him, he no longer endeavors to keep in mind all the evidence upon which he had asked that allowance, and the comrades who had been his witnesses may have scattered, or may have died; and yet the pensioner, unless this title shall be declared, is at the mercy of the Department, and if notice should be made, would be compelled to make some effort to gather together his scattered forces, relocate his absent comrades, and undertake anew to satisfy the Department that in the first instance had given so searching an investigation to his claim, and had passed upon it after it had met the requirements of five or six separate boards of examiners. If, however, we declare by the enactment of this law that when once this investigation has been made, once the claimant has complied with all the rules of the Department, and his efforts have been favored by an allowance, then that shall end the matter, and he shall be permitted to enjoy all the rights and comforts which ensue from that allowance.

No individual ever excuses fraud, and no one will undertake to defend fraud or challenge the right of the Government to become released from any liability that had been established by fraudulent methods. It is for this reason that this exception is recited in this bill, and that the right shall still obtain to the Government at any and all times to reexamine what may have been obtained by fraudulent means, and if such discovery is made that the Government shall have the right to suspend such pension. However, the Government having once had the opportunity to discover any irregularities or fraudulent practices, having had the opportunity at every stage of the progress of the claim through its various boards of examiners to discover these irregularities or frauds, the Government must take the burden of proof when once the claim has been allowed and prove the fraud before it can finally suspend the pension.

In the first instance all burden rests upon the claimant, and he has no rights until he has established his claim to the entire and complete satisfaction of the Bureau of Pensions. So that when fraud shall be alleged as a reason for the discontinuance of a pension, the burden should be upon the Government to establish that the fraud did exist. Until that fact is so established, the presumption of innocence should rest and remain with the pensioner. I shall not go into severe criticisms or abuse of the practices of the Department that have resulted in the suspension of so many thousands of pensions under existing rules, neither shall I resort to any harsh expressions, believing that the main object of this measure is to remedy these evils and not to exhaust language in abuse of them. There can be no doubt, however, but that hundreds of pensions have been thus suspended simply because the pensioner failed to comply with the demands of the Department to furnish additional proof of his disabilities. I shall not impugn these officers, however strong the temptation and facts may warrant, but I do insist that speedy remedy should be made to put a check, aye, to prohibit further continuance of any such practice or methods.

I am informed that in some instances examiners have given assurance that if a charge should be laid against a pensioner that his disability does not warrant the rating that he has been given that the Department will see that the claimant's pension is reduced. I have been informed that pensions have been suspended upon hearsay statements of a special examiner in the face of overwhelming evidence against the charges. I have been informed that after notices have been sent for a claimant to state why his pension should not be reduced that the reduction has followed notwithstanding the fact that evidence was furnished by the pensioner showing that he is still disabled to a sufficient degree to justify the rating that had been made. Now, I submit that when these pensions have been finally determined and allowed that no change whatever should of right be made unless the pensioner had obtained it originally by fraudulent practice.

There are instances where a disabled condition has forced the pensioner to develop new faculties and talents, and pursue other avocations than what he might have followed had not the disability have been incurred. If, for example, a soldier is pensioned for the loss of an arm or both limbs, his rating would be such as to compensate for that loss. But it was never intended that that individual should be required to remain idle and undertake to do nothing further than to draw his pension. Because, if the loss of his limbs or the impairment of his physical strength has necessitated more vigorous mental development and training, whereby the soldier may have acquired faculties of mind that might bring to him emoluments in fields of labor that would not require vigorous physical efforts, his pension should not be reduced or suspended. Suppose, for example, a soldier found himself at the close of the rebellion disabled in body to that extent that he could not perform manual labor and was totally physically disabled, that would bring to him under the rules of the Department the full allowance, and yet, not content to remain idle, he should by careful training and study so develop his faculties of mind and voice as to become an orator of note and influence that would attract to him demands for public speaking that would bring emoluments far in excess of his pension. Would it be fair to him, and did the Government intend that because he had been able to thus earn support despite his physical disabilities, that his pension should for that reason be suspended? And yet, unless we by legislation fix the title to the pension absolutely in the pensioner, not to be wrested from him or in any way disturbed, there is no guarantee or assurance but that under the existing rules of the Department some method may be discovered whereby the pension of such individuals might be suspended or discontinued.

To direct attention particularly to section 4 of the bill, I frankly acknowledge that it is proper for the Government to investigate a charge of fraud against any pensioner. But when so grievous a charge as that is made, the pensioner has the right to be informed of the names of the individuals who make such charge and to be apprised of the facts upon which the charges rest. He should have the right that every individual has in the smallest case at law—to confront his witness in open court and hear his statement and to subject him to cross-examination and meet his charges by evidence of his own. When these pensions have been allowed and the title given over to the pensioner, the charge of fraud fixes an imputation upon the pensioner. The presumption of innocence clothes him. His honor, integrity, and the good name of his family are at stake, and because of these things the Government owes it to its subjects, owes it to those who have established the title to this Government, to compel an open and frank and an honest investigation before it taints the good name of a soldier with the charge of fraud.

If an allegation of fraud is made, the pensioner whose pension is sought to be attacked shall be furnished with a certified copy of the allegations and the names of the witnesses who will be examined in support of the charge. This copy shall be furnished him at least thirty days before such investigation, and the names of the witnesses shall be furnished at least five days prior to their examination. The investigation shall be conducted at the county seat of the county in which the pensioner resides, except where witnesses live in other counties, and in that event their examination will follow the usual rules of law in force in the State of their residence. Under this method no hardship will accrue to the Government other than that incumbent upon her to make some investigation of the charges before the examination is had; in other words, compel the Government to prepare her case before she files it. As it is now, she simply serves notice on a pensioner to show cause, and if he fails to show cause his pension is at once discontinued.

Under the arrangement provided in this bill the Government would necessarily have to prepare a case in advance, and in so doing would avoid opening investigation that she did not feel assured would result in the suspension of the pension. I doubt not but that in hundreds of cases where simple notice is given by the Government the party whose pension is thus attacked is ignorant of what to do, and before he has fully advised himself what course to take the time has elapsed and it is too late. There certainly can be no reasonable objection to the enforcement of the procedure fixed by this section of the bill, and its results will guarantee to all the security and absolute safety of the pensions when once allowed, unless they have resorted to fraudulent practices in obtaining them. I sincerely believe that in following the procedure that I have outlined, after such scrutiny as is given originally by the Government upon all claims, this law will entirely do away with further suspensions and discontinuance of pensions.

It must be said, to the everlasting credit of the soldiers, that with all the machinery and means in the possession of the Government, managed and controlled by officers known to be hostile to the pensioners, less than 20 convictions for frauds have been effected in the past two years, notwithstanding the charge of the present Executive that "thousands of our neighborhoods have their fraudulent pensioners."

In my judgment this legislation at this time is of greater importance than legislation that seeks to enlarge the opportunities for the allowance of claims, because after the pension is allowed of what use may it be to the pensioner unless some safety is guaranteed to him in the pension. It can be but little consolation to him if clothed with doubt and uncertainty. In my judgment it devolves upon us to take such steps as shall remedy this evil, and so put away these doubts and forever dispose of the anxiety and unrest that have stricken terror to the hearts of the thousands of veterans who are so largely dependent upon this source of income. It is difficult for us to fully understand the extent of the anxiety that prevails. It is difficult for us to understand how far-reaching this disturbing element has been. There is an affinity between the veterans that can not fully and completely be appreciated by those who have been born since the opening of the war.

Those of us whose youth forbade contact with the times and appreciation of the trials, sacrifices, and hardships are absolutely unable to fully understand the tie of sympathy that binds the heartstrings of the soldiers. They have our regard and praise, our respect and honor, our unflinching love; but there is a something, undefined, uncolored, unknown to us, and which the soldiers themselves are unable to disclose or describe, that strikes a chord of sympathy that finds response only in the heart of him who has felt the pulse beat and the throat choke when first he parted from his home. It is felt by those who have together slept upon the same bed, with its scanty covering, while the cold rain beat against the leaking tent, or touched elbows as the quickened march brought them nearer the angered foe; who have pressed the hand of the wounded comrade in exchange for the message of hope to be conveyed to his dear ones; or who have together marched, slept, starved, and suffered with feelings so akin that thoughts seemed to be exchanged without the aid of speech and understandings, fathoms deep and freighted with meaning, were conveyed in the expression of the eye.

That sympathy between soldier and soldier was conceived in the common sorrow which all experienced upon enlistment; was nurtured by the common danger which threatened all alike; was warmed by the blood heat of battle; burned into their hearts by scenes and trials which no one can describe; and for thirty years has grown among the living or eased the dying moments of those who answered the last command of "taps," and for whom forever the "lights" are "out." Our failure to fully understand that sympathy is pardonable. But there is an appreciation which we owe them which we do understand, and a failure on our part is unpardonable. The recognition of the great work of the soldier, the true merit of his cause, and the scanty compensation for his wounds and crippled health, we can appreciate even better than they. They achieved the victory, our hearts are filled with gratitude. They suffered, we appreciate. They, without fear and little speech, discharged a grave duty. We praise and honor. They made peace and prosperity possible. We from the abundance of our fruits should ungrudgingly bestow bounteous aid for their shattered health and crippled limbs. In the dark hour of the nation's danger, when the lowering clouds of war hung over our land, they fought for us. And now, when age has weakened them, and enemies seek to withdraw the pitiful allowances a grateful Government has extended, and mar their good name with the blot of dishonor, we, using only the weapons of peace, should fight for them.

The friendship which developed a tie of sympathy between soldier and soldier as an outgrowth of the trials of the camp, the fatigue of the march, and the danger of the field, has in a measure been in part bestowed upon the children of the veterans so as to develop in them a desire to publicly exemplify their fidelity to the cause of their fathers, allegiance to their memory, and loyalty to the principles by which their acts were prompted.

If, by honest observance of the laws of the nation, due respect and reverence for our institutions, and allegiance to the flag, a spirit of patriotism shall be engendered, then the acts of the younger men become a monument to the "veterans," whose memory shall be forever beautified.

It was not given to us to witness the carnage at Shiloh, suffer the disastrous repulse in the charge upon the works at Vicksburg, breathe the miasmas of the Virginia swamps, or hear the whistling of the bullets in the Wilderness. It was not given to us to cheer the fall of Donelson, share the victory of Gettysburg, or participate in the triumphal march to the sea, or the grand review that displayed to the nation's capital the shattered army of victorious people triumphant in its cause.

But it is ours to rejoice in the achievement of those arms, respect the memory of those men, extend honor to their names, and by our conduct prove ourselves worthy of their sacrifice. [Loud applause.]

Mr. BROWN. Mr. Chairman, the pending bill in all respects meets my views and has my unqualified support. This bill does not enlarge the pension list and does not increase pensions, but it undertakes simply to correct many of the wrongs and injustices now found to exist in the Pension Bureau in the administration of our pension laws, and may be called a bill to better administer the present pension laws.

I endorse that patriotic sentiment that the claims of those who risked their lives and their all in defense of the best Government known to man "should not be weighed in an apothecary's scales."

It is now conceded by all that it is a sacred duty of this Government to provide in a generous way for the brave men who fought that we and the unborn millions might enjoy to the latest posterity the benefits of a republican government.

I prefer to regard the pension granted the soldier and his widow and children as a bounty freely given to him by a generous Government.

This view best accords with the idea of the generosity and large-heartedness of our people. It is not the paying of what we are compelled to pay, but it is the gift of a bounty because of sacrifices freely made in time of great public peril.

It is not my purpose to discuss the whole bill now before the House, but to speak especially of the first section, and I shall at the proper time offer an amendment to this section.

The first section is as follows:

SECTION 1. That no person otherwise entitled to a pension by virtue of any law of the United States shall be disqualified from receiving the same by reason of any prior service in the Confederate army or navy during the war of the rebellion, nor shall the widow, children, or dependent relatives of such person be deprived of a right to pension by reason of such service.

The amendment which I offer reads as follows:

Provided, That pensioners who have been dropped from the rolls since March 4, 1865, solely on account or because of previous Confederate service shall be at once restored without formal application, and their pensions shall commence from the time their names were dropped from the rolls.

I shall offer this amendment because I do not believe any provision of the bill will remedy the wrong intended to be remedied by this amendment, and I hope the chairman of the Invalid Pensions Committee will agree to this amendment. I offer this amendment because a great many pensioners have been dropped from the pension rolls under the act of June 27, 1890, solely on account of their previous service in the Confederate army, and when this is the case they should be restored without further formal application and their pay commence from the time their pensions were so discontinued.

Mr. PICKLER. Suppose the persons whose pensions the gentleman proposes to restore by this amendment should be dead?

Mr. BROWN. Then, of course, their widows would receive the pension.

Mr. PICKLER. I think there is no question that this bill will fully provide for all proper cases where pensions have been dropped. We have made the terms of the bill as broad as it would be safe to make them. The committee thought that it would be very unsafe to undertake by a wholesale enactment to say that all these men who have been dropped should be restored. Some of them have died; some of them have already had their pensions restored; in some cases the disability has ceased.

Mr. BROWN. No men have been restored, so far as I know, where the pension has been discontinued on account of previous service in the Confederate army.

Mr. PICKLER. But, let me say to the gentleman, there must be some kind of identification.

Mr. BROWN. If the pensioner has died, the pension of course will not be paid to him.

Mr. PICKLER. But such a case will be covered by your amendment.

Mr. BROWN. No, sir.

Mr. PICKLER. Your amendment says that if the pensioner has been dropped his pension shall be restored.

Mr. BROWN. But it does not provide that the pension shall be paid if the party is in fact dead.

Mr. PICKLER. I am in accord with the gentleman's views in regard to the justice of restoration generally in these cases; but the bill as we have drawn it will accomplish the object which the gentleman seeks.

Mr. BROWN. The fourth section of the bill, as I understand, will give the Pension Department the opportunity to pass again upon the question of the pensioner's right to the pension. Now, this amendment provides that in the event that the pensioner has been dropped from the rolls solely on the ground of previous Confederate service it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Pensions to immediately restore his name to the pension roll. As a matter of course, if the pensioner has in the meantime died, the pension will not be paid to him.

Mr. CROWTHER. I suggest to the gentleman that the restoration provided for by section 4 of this bill would enable the party to be readmitted to the pension roll.

Mr. BROWN. Does not that provision leave the Pension Department at liberty to adjudicate again the question of the pensioner's right to the pension?

Mr. CROWTHER. No; section 1 covers that.

Mr. BROWN. The purpose of my amendment is simply that a party who has been wrongfully dropped from the rolls shall be restored to the rolls without further formal application.

Mr. PICKLER. Section 3 ought certainly to accomplish the object the gentleman has in view. That section provides—

That all pensions reduced or discontinued since January 7, 1863, shall, upon application, be reconsidered and adjudicated in accordance with the provisions of this act, and the pension, if restored or allowed, shall commence from the date of such reduction or discontinuance, or from the date subsequent thereto at which the disability is shown by the evidence to have existed.

Now, for the reasons I have suggested, it would not do for us to undertake by any wholesale provision to restore all these pensions that have been dropped.

Now, in regard to the amendment which the gentleman suggests and other amendments which are proposed and other objections which are presented here, I wish to say that for six long weeks we have considered this measure in the Committee on Invalid Pensions; and although we may be mistaken in some of the provisions which we have adopted, yet during the consideration of this bill no proposition has been presented to the House that was not fully discussed pro and con in the committee. I repeat, it would be very unsafe to provide that the whole list of pensions that have been discontinued should be restored. In some cases the disability may have ceased; in some cases the widow may have been drawing pension and she may have died.

Mr. BROWN. I wish to say that I think this is a most excellent bill in its general provisions and one which ought to be passed. I simply wished to bring this amendment to the consideration of the chairman and members of the Invalid Pensions Committee.

Mr. PICKLER. I am quite in accord with the object which the gentleman seeks.

Mr. BROWN. Now, Mr. Chairman, addressing myself to the first section of this bill and the amendment thereto, under what is known and designated as the general pension law, previous service in the Confederate army was and is no bar to a pension for injury received or disability incurred in the line of duty in the service of the United States, and this is now the holding of the present Commissioner of Pensions. But under the act of June 27, 1890, as now construed by the Pension Department, service in the Confederate army is a bar to any man, no matter how long he may have served in the Union Army, and although he may have received at the close of the war an honorable discharge.

This construction of the act of June 27, 1890, is not what Congress intended, and is made in violation of every rule for the construction of acts of Congress, and is contrary to the former holding of the Pension Department, but this is the ruling of the Interior Department, and the only remedy now is to correct the wrongful construction by an act of Congress; and this is done by the first section of this bill. To be entirely fair and just to the Department, I shall state more accurately the ruling of the Department.

In substance its holding is that when a soldier appears to have been enlisted or conscripted into the Confederate service, and afterwards enlisted in the United States Army, the presumption is that he voluntarily rendered aid and assistance to the Confederate government, and is not pensionable, and the presumption is so great that it can not be overcome by his own testimony, however strong, and although he may swear that he never voluntarily rendered any service. I give you an illustration showing the injustice and harshness of the ruling of the Department.

It is the case of Thomas K. Edgman, of McMinn County, Tenn., who was pensioned under the act of June 27, 1890, and dropped from the rolls on account of his Confederate service.

On application to be reinstated, the following state of facts was shown.

Claimant proved by five or six good citizens, neighbors and long-time acquaintances, that he was a Union man; that he voted both times against secession in Tennessee, when submitted to a vote of the people in Tennessee; that he made two attempts to escape from McMinn County, where he lived (then in control of the Confederate authorities), and to go to the Union Army in Kentucky; that at the second attempt his relatives, who were in sympathy with the Confederacy, believing that he intended to go into the Union Army, had him (while on his way out of McMinn County) arrested by the Confederate military authorities, sent him off to some point above Knoxville, and compelled him to join the Confederate army. Soon after this he was sent to Vicksburg, Miss., and while there he and some others, seizing the first opportunity, laid down their arms and made their escape into the Union lines, joined Grant's army, served twenty-two months, and received an honorable discharge. And to make a still stronger case, Mr. Edgman swore, and his testimony was corroborated by two or three men who were with him in the Confederate army, that his Union sentiments were so strong that while he served in the Confederate army he never fired his gun, and while he was forced to do some service, he made up his mind from the start to do as little as possible, so as not to hurt or harm anyone on the other side. With all this proof of his loyalty to his country he was dropped from the rolls.

This is one of a large class of men who have suffered wrong and been denied justice by the unwarranted construction of the act of June 27, 1890.

In order that this House may know the difficulties which surrounded the Union men of the border States, and especially of east Tennessee, and that this House may fully appreciate the valuable services rendered by the Union men of the border States to this Government during the war, and, having this knowledge, to be better prepared to do them the simple justice long denied them. I desire to call attention to some of the history of our country in east Tennessee during the late war.

It is not my purpose to refer to these matters in order to stir up strife or to kindle anew any of the flames and passions of the war, but simply and alone that the truth of history may be known. I am glad to say that the people of the South are as loyal to this Government and love our republican institutions as much as the people of any other section of the country, and I do not believe there is in the whole South to-day a single intelligent man who wishes that the Confederacy had succeeded.

The Southern people are anxious that the feelings and prejudices growing out of the war may be forgotten, and that we shall all unite in an earnest effort to make our country what God intended it should be, the greatest and grandest country in all the earth, and because the people of the South have been undecieved and now believe that the Republican party is a national party, willing to legislate for the best interests of the whole country, many, yes, thousands, who have heretofore acted with the Democratic party, who believe in sound money, a protective tariff, and the national policies of the Republican party, have parted company with the Democracy, and on questions of tariff, finance, etc., have come into the Republican party, and have come on principle, and for principle, and come to stay. And if we act wisely, addressing ourselves in a courageous way to do for the best interests of the country, leaving the Southern people to settle in their own way the race problem and the control of elections, we shall see the Republican party in the South composed of the best and most intelligent citizens and voters, and we shall see the Democratic party there rent in twain, divided and disorganized, and appealing for support to the worst element of society in that favored land.

Tennessee was one of the last of the States to go out of the Union. East Tennessee, or, more accurately, the eastern part of the State, was strongly opposed to secession. It was intensely Whig before the war. The people who lived there were Federal Whigs of the Alexander Hamilton and George Washington school, believing in a strong National Government. Being great admirers of Webster and Clay, they believed the Union should be preserved at all hazards, and in the campaign of 1860 had supported Bell and Everett, and marched, rallied, and hurraed to the campaign slogan of "the Union, the Constitution, and the enforcement of the laws." So when it was proposed to go out of the Union the people of east Tennessee strongly protested.

The people of Tennessee voted twice in 1861 on the question of seceding after the other States had gone out of the Union. At the first election the vote was overwhelmingly against secession, east Tennessee voting 34,400 for the Union and 7,000 against. But soon after this an extra session of the legislature was called and the question again submitted, and this time, on account of the presence of Confederate troops which had been brought into Tennessee, although it was still a State of the Union, and by other unfairness, it is claimed, Tennessee was voted out of the Union, although east Tennessee voted this last time largely against the proposition to go out of the Union.

Immediately the governor of the State called for a large number of volunteers for the Confederate army, and many thousands promptly responded, but comparatively few from east Tennessee, and later conscription was resorted to, largely on account of the attitude of east Tennessee.

The Union men did not believe a State could vote itself out of the Union, and instead of tamely submitting, as the Union men did farther South, they met in open convention at Greeneville, Tenn., on June 17, 1861, only a few days after the last vote on secession or separation, and in a largely attended convention, with delegates from every county in east Tennessee, passed resolutions strongly condemning the effort to take Tennessee out of the Union. This protest, however, was all in vain; the story of east Tennessee from this time on was written in blood and tears.

Immediately after this Greeneville convention the Confederate authorities, in order to retain supremacy in east Tennessee, occupied this territory with a large military force, and continued to hold this territory until September 4, 1863, when General Burnside entered Knoxville with his army, Colonel Foster, afterwards Secretary of State under General Harrison, leading the advance. The Confederate authorities found it necessary to keep a large force in east Tennessee on account of the strong Union sentiment there; and while the Confederate authorities occupied this territory Union men were compelled to join the Confederate army or go to Southern prisons, and this class of men are denied pensions now, although they quit the Confederate service at the first opportunity.

The State administration early took steps to enforce the doctrine of repression in east Tennessee. Confederate States troops from Alabama, Georgia, Louisiana, and Mississippi were hurried up and quartered, under various pretenses, in the mountains.

The question of "taking sides" actively, marching under the "stars and bars" or under the "Stars and Stripes," was forced to an issue. The day of discussion was a brief one. The conscript officer appeared on the scene. The way for this was prepared by reports that a Federal army was marching into Tennessee from Kentucky. Doubt and confusion were part of the atmosphere. The Union men who could be apprehended were conscripted into the Confederate army. Many fled, first to the mountains, to escape conscription, where they were fed for months by the Union women of the vicinity, and at length, despairing of Buell's army reaching east Tennessee, many of them determined to make their way to the Union Army in Kentucky. The traveling was to be done by night, and the journey lay over mountains and across deep rivers, and must be done with extreme caution, for the passes from Tennessee into Kentucky were constantly and strongly guarded. Many of the men thus attempting, through dangers and extreme cold, to reach and join the Union Army, because they wanted the Union preserved, were captured and compelled to join the Confederate army. Was it any disgrace or dishonor for them to desert a cause which they abhorred and to fight for a cause they loved?

Both generals—Grant and Sherman—in their memoirs speak of the desertions from the Confederate army before Vicksburg, on the march to the sea, and at other points. These were not the men who, believing in secession, had risked their all and gone to fight for what they believed to be right. These were not cowards, for braver men never marched to martial music than the Confederate soldiers, but they were in large part the Union men from the border States who did not believe in secession, but in the Union, and had been compelled to join a cause they hated, and felt it the exercise of the highest patriotism to quit this cause and fight for the old flag which they had been taught to love since they first looked on its sacred folds. And these are the men who, having quit the Confederate service with joy and gladness, joined the Union Army, fought bravely during the war, as all Tennesseans ever did, whether at Kings Mountain, under Jackson at New Orleans, during the Indian war, or under General Scott in Mexico, and made Tennessee famous as the Volunteer State; and these Union men having fought through the war and received an honorable discharge, and having seen peace restored, our country reunited, are in their extreme old age and helpless condition denied a small pension because of service in the Confederate army which they were compelled to render.

A generous Government will not tolerate this, and no brave, true man will wish that it should. The perilous situation of the east Tennessee loyalists and the great help rendered the Union cause by them was known to and recognized by President Lincoln, and he was constantly urging General Buell, then in Kentucky, to move into east Tennessee with his army to relieve them.

Mr. Lincoln, in a dispatch to General Buell dated January 6, 1862, says:

EXECUTIVE MANSION, Washington, January 6, 1862.

MY DEAR SIR: Your dispatch of yesterday has been received, and it disappoints and distresses me. * * * My distress is that our friends in east Tennessee are being hanged and driven to despair, and even now I fear are thinking of taking rebel arms for the sake of personal protection. In this we lose the most valuable stake we have in the South. My dispatch to which yours is an answer was sent with the knowledge of Senator Johnson and Representative Maynard, of east Tennessee, and they will be upon me to know the answer, which I can not safely show them. They would despair; possibly resign to go and save their families somehow or die with them.

I do not intend this to be an order in any sense, but merely, as intimated before, to show you the grounds of my anxiety.

Yours, very truly,

A. LINCOLN.

Brigadier-General BUELL.

General McClellan also felt the same way, as is seen by the following dispatch to General Buell:

CONFIDENTIAL.] WASHINGTON, Monday, January 6, 1862.

MY DEAR GENERAL: * * * There are few things I have more at heart than the prompt movement of a strong column into eastern Tennessee. The political consequences of the delay of this movement will be much more serious than you seem to anticipate. If relief is not soon afforded those people we shall lose them entirely, and with them the power of inflicting the most severe blow upon the secession cause.

I was extremely sorry to learn from your telegram to the President that you had from the beginning attached little or no importance to a movement in east Tennessee. I had not so understood your views, and it develops a radical difference between your views and my own, which I deeply regret.

Interesting as Nashville may be to the Louisville interests, it strikes me that its possession is of very secondary importance in comparison with the immense results that would arise from the adherence to our cause of the masses in east Tennessee, west North Carolina, South Carolina, north Georgia, and Alabama—results that I feel assured would ere long flow from the movement I allude to.

In haste, my dear General, very truly, yours,

GEO. B. MCCLELLAN,

Major-General, Commanding.

Brig. Gen. D. C. BUELL, Louisville, Ky.

Although with all the urging on the part of the President and his superior, General McClellan, Buell did not move into east Tennessee, and that section of Tennessee was not permanently occupied until later by the Federals. The aid rendered the Union cause by the Union men, not only of east Tennessee, but by the loyal men of all the border States, while known to the President and the Union officers, is hardly known to the general public, and has not been appreciated since as it should have been. I do not desire to take from any section or from any men the glory to which it or they may be entitled for the splendid services and sacrifices rendered for the Union cause. I do wish to see justice done to loyal men of the border States, who made many sacrifices for their "opinions' sake."

A brief review of the part played by the loyal men of the border States in the late war will not be considered, I hope, out of place here.

The whole number of men furnished to the Union Army, according to the Adjutant-General's report of November 9, 1880, from the firing on Fort Sumter to the close of the war, was 2,865,028, of which the Northern States furnished 2,432,801 men. The census of 1860 showed that the number of white males of the military age (between 18 and 45) in the Northern States was 4,337,000, so that the troops furnished by them to the Union Army were 60 per cent of the available men. Turning to the slave States, the first discovery is the amazing one that Delaware furnished a larger number of troops to the Union Army in proportion to her available military population than any other State in any part of the country. This is so contrary to accepted ideas that the average Northern Republican would pronounce the statement absurd on its face. But the figures leave no room for doubt. Delaware had in 1860 only 18,273 white males between the ages of 18 and 45. She sent 13,670 men into the Union Army, which equaled 74.8 per cent. New Hampshire contributed only about 54 per cent, Vermont and Massachusetts 58 per cent, Maine 59 per cent, Rhode Island 66 per cent, Illinois and Ohio 69 per cent, Kansas 72 per cent, and Indiana 74 per cent.

The other border States did nearly as well. Maryland had 102,715 white males of army age, and 50,316 of them did service for the Union, being almost exactly 49 per cent. Kentucky had 180,589 men to call upon, and 79,035, or nearly 44 per cent, responded. Missouri had 232,781 white males, and 109,111 of them went into the Union Army, being almost 47 per cent. West Virginia did not fall behind. She had 66,500 white males, of whom 32,068 became Union soldiers, or more than 48 per cent. Even Tennessee, one of the States which actually seceded, furnished no less than 31,095 men to the Union Army.

Altogether, the thirteen slave States contributed 493,237 men in defense of the Union. Kentucky also furnished 23,708 colored troops, which do not enter into this calculation. Maryland and Missouri also supplied the Army with a large contingent for the same arm of the service. It thus appears that one-seventh of the Union Army came from the South.

Contemplate, if you will, what would have been the result if this half million of strong, brave men had been in the Confederate army, making a difference of a million of men, and the border States of east Tennessee, Missouri, Kentucky, Delaware, Maryland, North Carolina, and West Virginia had been as enthusiastically against the Union as Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, South Carolina, and the other cotton States. Not only would the seat of war have been in the North, but the result made more doubtful, to say the least.

LOYALTY OF EAST TENNESSEE AS ATTESTED BY A CONFEDERATE OFFICER.

In an article in the Century Magazine of February, 1885, Col. William Preston Johnson (son of Gen. Albert Sydney Johnson, and a member of Jeff. Davis's staff during the war), writing on the battle of Shiloh, and defending his father from the severe criticism of certain Southern newspapers for the loss of Forts Donelson and Henry, the evacuation of Bowling Green, and the disaster at Fishing Creek, says:

His father's army was weakened by the necessity of keeping thousands of troops in east Tennessee to overawe the Union population there, and so as to guard the only line of railroad communication between Virginia and Tennessee.

He further says:

This hostile section penetrated the heart of the Confederacy like a wedge, and flanked and weakened General Johnson's line of defense, requiring, as it did, constant vigilance and repression.

Gen. D. H. Hill, of the Confederate army, insisted a few years ago that the rebellion was suppressed by Southern men. Whether this be true or not, it is true that the first repulse to the Southern army was inflicted at Mill Springs by General Thomas, a Southern loyalist. The first confidence inspired in the demoralized army of Bull Run was owing to the generalship of Ord, of Maryland, at Dranesville. Blair, Canby, Crittenden, Alexander, and Nelson were born in Kentucky. Newton and Cook were Virginians; Ord and Sykes were Marylanders.

The most successful of all naval heroes was David G. Farragut, an east Tennessee boy. Dupont of Delaware and Goldsborough of Maryland made the first lodgment on the Atlantic coast.

When the Federal Army had been scattered at Chickamauga, who was it that stood at Rossville, Ga., like a rock in the ocean against which the waves dash and fret in vain? It was Thomas, the rock of Chickamauga.

Had it not been for the stubborn resistance of this gallant general and his brave men, Chickamauga would have been a complete Federal rout and the Confederacy an established fact at this very hour.

We have the testimony of Generals Grant and Sherman for the statement that the Union men of east Tennessee, out of their scanty supplies, fed General Burnside's starving army during the siege of Knoxville, and the loyal people of the Sequatchie Valley contributed liberally to feed General Rosecrans's army at Chattanooga before General Grant established the "cracker line" to Bridgeport, Ala.

H. V. Redfield, at one time the able correspondent of the Cincinnati Commercial Gazette, writing about Tennessee troops, says: A detail of the exploits of the Tennessee troops in the Union Army would fill volumes.

The Tennessee troops were fighters rather than writers, and they left little record of their transactions. It was Tennessee troops who finally routed the famous cavalry command of Gen. John H. Morgan, and killed that famous rider. He vanquished armies and captured more prisoners in a single raid than his own men numbered, yet a strange fate decreed that he should meet his fate at the hands of Tennessee Unionists, aided by a Michigan regiment.

And the capture of Morgan was equal to the destruction of an army.

Mr. Chairman, I have not thus spoken to stir up bad blood, to bring skeletons from moldy graves to speak the language of revenge, but to set forth the work and virtues of humble people, who helped to continue and extend American institutions by heroic devotion and suffering, and have proved by their suffering that love of country is a divine truth; that the United States is not a rope of sand tying together antagonistic States; that the Constitution is not a "glittering generality," but a "divine ubiquity," a law of growth, freedom, and civilization, and that long-delayed justice may speedily be done the Union men of the South, many of them the descendants of the heroes of Kings Mountain, New Orleans, Monterey, and Buena Vista.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Mr. Chairman, before proceeding, I desire to yield two minutes to my colleague from Illinois [Mr. SMITH] for the purpose of suggesting an amendment he proposes to offer at the proper time.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to discuss this measure at this time, but will probably have something to say upon it under the five-minute debate. I have read this bill carefully and believe it to be a good one, although I believe, at the same time, it might be amended in some one or two respects with advantage, and that certain amendments which could not be objectionable to anyone might be incorporated in the bill which would be beneficial.

But I only desire now to give notice that at the proper time I shall offer an amendment on page 3 of the bill, and I ask unanimous consent that that amendment may go into the RECORD—it will take about five or six lines of the RECORD—so that members of the committee may have an opportunity of considering it before it comes up under the five-minute rule. I ask that the amendment be read as a part of my remarks.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 3, after section 4, insert the following, to be known as section 4b, namely:

"That hereafter, in the administration of the pension laws and determination of the rights of any claimant to a pension or an increase of pension, the same shall be determined solely on the sworn testimony, or affirmation, of witnesses, taken under the provisions of law; and the unsworn statements of any person or persons relative to the credibility of witnesses, or as to supposed facts in connection with such claims, shall not be considered or accepted by the Pension Office officials to impeach or discredit the sworn statements, or affirmation, of a witness."

[Mr. CONNOLLY addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CONNOLLY. I would like to have enough time to call attention to this section.

Mr. SPERRY. I ask that the gentleman have further time.

The CHAIRMAN. It is also five minutes to 5 o'clock, when the House must take a recess.

Mr. CONNOLLY. I will yield.

Mr. PICKLER. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PAYNE, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 8271) relating to pensions, and had come to no resolution thereon.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER. The Indian appropriation bill has come back from the Senate with Senate amendments and a request for a conference. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], a member of the committee, moves that the House nonconcur in the Senate amendments and agree to the request for a conference. Without objection it will be so ordered; and the Chair will appoint as conferees on the part of the House the gentleman from New York, Mr. SHERMAN, the gentleman from Kansas, Mr. CURTIS, and the gentleman from Texas, Mr. PENDLETON.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

CONNEAUT, OHIO, A SUBPORT OF ENTRY.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Ways and Means direct me to report back the bill (H. R. 4787) to establish the port of Conneaut, in the State of Ohio, as a subport of entry in the district of Cuyahoga, in the said State of Ohio.

Mr. DINGLEY. Ask for its passage. It can be passed in a moment or two.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I ask unanimous consent to pass the bill. The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BAILEY. Let us hear what the bill is.

Mr. GROSVENOR. It is a bill to establish a subport of entry at a little town in Ohio.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4787) to establish the port of Conneaut, in the State of Ohio, as a support of entry in the district of Cuyahoga, in said State of Ohio.

Be it enacted, etc., That the port of Conneaut, in the State of Ohio, be, and the same is hereby, declared to be a support of entry in the district of Cuyahoga, in said State of Ohio, from and after the passage of this act.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

SENATE BILLS AND RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following Senate bills and resolution were taken from the Speaker's table and referred by the Speaker as follows:

Concurrent resolution—

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring). That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to rescind his orders to the Commissioner of the General Land Office suspending work upon the Union Pacific Railroad Company land lists now on file, embracing lands along the Union Pacific main line in western Nebraska, northern Colorado, Wyoming, and Utah, and shall cause work thereon to be resumed and patents to issue to the Union Pacific Railway Company without delay to all lands described in the several lists now on file in the United States Land Office upon which title is due to the Union Pacific Railway Company, in order to complete, through the Union Pacific Railway Company, good and sufficient title to the purchasers and present owners of such lands: Provided, No patents shall be issued for any lands which have not been sold by said company prior to the passage of this resolution—

To the Committee on the Public Lands.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HAGER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same, to wit:

A bill (H. R. 951) to amend the military record of Dan S. Place, first lieutenant, Eighteenth Indiana Volunteers; and

A bill (S. 1835) to execute the findings of the Court of Claims in the matter of the claim of John J. Shipman against the United States.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows: To Mr. BROSIUS, for three days, on account of important business.

To Mr. GOODWYN, for twelve days, on account of important business.

REPRINT OF BILL.

On the request of Mr. SPERRY, a reprint was ordered of the bill (H. R. 3273) for the classification of clerks in the first and second class post-offices, for the purpose of correcting an error in the reported bill.

Mr. PICKLER. I ask consent that the House take a recess now.

Mr. SCRANTON. Pending that, I desire a change of reference made.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. SCRANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the bill (H. R. 2466) to approve an act of the legislative assembly of the Territory of New Mexico entitled "An act to create a county court" be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. It was referred to the Committee on Territories.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks a change of reference of this bill from the Committee on Territories to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PERKINS. What is the bill?

The SPEAKER. An act creating a county court in New Mexico. [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection, and the change of reference will be made.

REPRINT.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for a reprint of the bill under consideration (H. R. 3271).

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The SPEAKER. The time having arrived for the recess, the House is now declared in recess until 8 o'clock this evening, and the gentleman from New York, Mr. PAYNE, will please take the chair at that time.

And accordingly (at 5 o'clock) the House was declared in recess.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House reassembled at 8 o'clock p. m.

Mr. PAYNE, as Speaker pro tempore, called the House to order and directed the reading of the special order, as follows:

The House shall on each Friday at 5 o'clock p. m. take a recess until 8 o'clock, at which evening session private pension bills, bills for the removal of political disabilities, and bills removing charges of desertion only shall be considered; said evening session not to extend beyond 10 o'clock and 30 minutes.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of business on the Private Calendar.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. PICKLER, the Speaker declared that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. TALBERT. A division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 45, noes none; so the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. HEPBURN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of business on the Private Calendar. The Clerk will report the first bill.

JOHN KEHL.

The bill (H. R. 1261) for the relief of John Kehl was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and instructed to restore the rating of John Kehl, late of Company D, Ninth Regiment of Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, to the rate of $30 per month, as it was previous to July, 1893.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, when we adjourned on last Friday evening we were discussing the propriety of the passage of this bill. If I am not mistaken, I had the floor when the hour of adjournment arrived. I do not believe that we ought to grant any increase of pension in this case. I think this man is justly entitled to what he is receiving, $8 per month, but I fail to see any testimony which leads me to conclude that his pension ought to be increased. Therefore, to prevent friction and in order that we may move on and consider other more meritorious bills which possibly may be found upon the Calendar, I trust that the gentleman in charge of this bill will not press it this evening, but will let it be passed over without prejudice until the case can be further investigated and more proof, if possible, presented than is contained in the report of the committee in favor of increasing this pension. I hope the bill will not be favorably passed upon by this committee at this time.

Mr. BROMWELL. Mr. Chairman, so far from adopting the suggestion of the distinguished gentleman from South Carolina, I shall most unhesitatingly urge that this Committee of the Whole report this bill favorably and recommend its passage. I have gone very carefully over the reports of the various medical examinations in this case—there are six of them—and I am satisfied that no more meritorious bill ever came before the House of Representatives, and I hope to be able to show this committee that this has been a case of the most unjust persecution of this man from the time his first application for an increase was made up to the present time.

I shall state briefly the facts in this case. It is not a pleasant case to discuss in the presence of this House or in the presence of those who are visiting us this evening, but justice to this man demands that I shall speak plainly and deal plainly with this subject. In 1884 John Kehl, a poor, ignorant old German, applied for and was granted a pension at the rate of $3 per month, for disease of the heart and rheumatism, resulting from cold and exposure while in the military service. He applied for an increase. On the 25th of August, 1884, the report of the medical board, consisting of Drs. Muscroft, Stevenson, and Prendergrast, three of the most reputable citizens of the city of Cincinnati, was substantially as follows. The language which I am about to read is quoted exactly from their report:

This man's case, in our opinion, shows the commencement of some special disease which is still somewhat obscure and prevents a diagnosis, but will result in locomotor ataxia. We think his present disability entitles him to three-fourths of total rating.

Now, the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TALBERT], for whom I have the highest regard and respect personally, is like some other members of this House who think it is extremely amusing and entertaining to boast of their ignorance. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that a man who has been studying these pension matters as he has been during this session and before, ought to know something of the meaning of medical terms, and when the gentleman gets up and talks about locomotor ataxia and twists and distorts the term, and then says that he does not know what it means, that is a confession of ignorance which, if I were he, I should be ashamed to make. I will say to the gentleman that locomotor ataxia is a complaint which results in lameness and inability to move the limbs, or rather inability to control their motions, and it is often a result of exposure to severe cold and rheumatism and other influences of that kind.

Mr. TALBERT. I want to say to the gentleman that "the gentleman from South Carolina" knows a little more about this case than you think he does.

Mr. BROMWELL (continuing). On the strength of this report this man was given a pension of $8 a month. He applied for an increase. He lived in the city of Cincinnati. And here let me say that whenever an unfavorable report was to be obtained in this case (and there were three of them, more or less unfavorable) they took him away from Cincinnati, his home—once to Covington, Ky., and twice to Hamilton, Ohio, 25 miles distant from where he lived—and had him examined there, while the examinations by the physicians in Cincinnati, his home, were invariably favorable to his application. I mention this as a coincidence. The examination at Hamilton, Ohio, which took place on the 29th of May, 1888, before Drs. Hinckley and McNeeley, contains this language:

Scars of bubos are visible in each groin. Formerly drank freely, but now only temperately. We believe his trouble is due to spinal sclerosis from syphilitic taint.

That was by the examining board at Hamilton, Ohio, and, as I have said, was made and dated on the 29th of May, 1888. With the delay usual in the Pension Office under all administrations—I do not make any special criticism upon the present administration in that respect—this case was not again considered or an examination had until the 4th of September, 1889, a year and a half after the Hamilton examination. This examination was made by Drs. Hartshorn, Smith, and Klein at Cincinnati.

They say:

He is, in our opinion, entitled to first-grade rating for the disability caused by rheumatism, enlargement of the heart, locomotor ataxia.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as most of the members present are aware, locomotor ataxia is not a disease that comes suddenly; it is not a disease that develops itself at once, and at a stroke, like paralysis, immediately destroys all power and control of the limbs, but is a disease that is insidious and grows steadily day by day. This report continues:

There is reason to believe that he had suffered exposure previous to or at the time of his attack of rheumatism to produce the locomotor ataxia. In this particular there is a very close connection of the causes of rheumatism and locomotor ataxia. The applicant is totally disabled, requiring regular aid and attendance of another person.

Now, on the 27th day of February, 1890, or six months after this report was made, the Commissioner of Pensions not yet having acted on the case, the following instructions were issued for another examination in the case of this man. These are the identical words of the instructions:

It is desired in this case that the examination be made with special reference to chronic rheumatism and results. Claimant is on the rolls for rheumatism and resulting disease of the heart and alleges also resulting paralysis. There is a prevalent impression of a syphilitic taint in this case, and to this point your attention is especially directed.

I ask your attention to that language, because it called the special attention of the examining board to this part of the case and to what the medical examiners in the Department had done with a view to discovering the nature of this man's disability.

Please examine with care and let your report state what, if any, agency syphilis has had in causing present disabilities. Please state also as to condition of skin, throat, groins, bones, head, and scalp, as to any signs of syphilis which may be shown.

THOS. D. INGRAM,
Medical Referee.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to call the attention of the committee to the condition of certain parts of the body of this applicant as shown by the examination of the case; because, as a result of this dreadful disease, these are the parts of the body that are always and invariably affected. This report of the board of examiners, a board composed of three eminent physicians in the city of Cincinnati, than whom none stand higher in this country, men with whom I am personally acquainted—Dr. A. C. Kemper, Dr. J. W. Stevenson, and Dr. A. B. Isham, himself a gallant soldier, who carries a wounded limb, and has a limp resulting from this wound received in the service that he will carry during his lifetime.

On March 10, 1890, this board used this language, and I will say that I have not quoted the report in full, as it is not necessary. I have quoted the language mainly applicable to the complaint to which reference has been made as affecting the standing of this applicant before the office. In that report they say:

Skin and tongue healthy. Find he has decided dragging of the right leg, with staxia gait; some incoordination of muscles of right arm and hand. He is, in our opinion, entitled to a second-grade rating for the disability caused by rheumatism and spinal sclerosis.

Mr. ERDMAN. Will you permit an inquiry just there?

Mr. BROMWELL. No; not now.

Mr. ERDMAN. I suppose you will read the whole report?

Mr. BROMWELL. I will be glad to have the gentleman read the whole report if it will be any satisfaction to him. I am reading substantially the entire report, particularly that part of it which bears on this special disease. They say, continuing:

Unable to button clothes with right hand; could detect no anasthesia of any part; * * * unable to stand alone with eyes shut. Find a cicatrix from ulcer under glans penis and near meatus, having destroyed prepuce and enlarged meatus somewhat; no induration. Could detect no enlargement of any of the glands of the body; no scars in groin; no nodes or enlargement of any of the bones indicative of syphilis. Says he had a sore on penis, but could get no other history of syphilis and no other evidence of any. Could detect no other changes in the case. This man is totally disabled, due to spinal sclerosis, and if it is the result of his army service we recommend a second-grade rating.

Now, I will say that most of the usual sequelæ of this disease are the enlargement of the glands on the back of the neck and the enlargement of the glands on the arm. The examiners at Hamilton spoke of having found lumps or enlargement of the glands in the groin. This examination finds a complete absence of any of those symptoms. Other symptoms are usually the falling out of the hair and the growth of nodes or lumps upon the scalp. Those are all missing; there is nothing of that kind.

Not satisfied with this report made by these three eminent physicians of Cincinnati, the Department sent this case to Covington, in the State of Kentucky, and there, on the 26th of August, 1892, before Drs. Tarvin, Davis, and Stuard, an examination was had, from the report of which I will read an extract; and I will say that in making the selection of what I read I have picked out those parts which refer to the particular disease in question; and if I omit any part which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ERDMAN] wishes to include in his reply, I shall be very glad to have him do it. But I did not suppose the House would care to hear the entire report. I am dealing fairly with the House and giving in each case the worst statement made in the report. This board of examiners at Covington says:

He makes the following statement: "Also syphilis in 1863."

Now, as I stated on last Friday night when this matter was up, this claimant being an ignorant German and not understanding well the English language, misunderstood the question put to him in the first examination, and supposed it was whether he had ever had erysipelas, and he replied that he had. But the examiners put it down in their statement that he had admitted he had had syphilis. Then this board goes on to say:

Well-marked cicatrix on left side of glans penis and slight loss of substance of lower wall of meatus, the result of initial lesion of syphilis. * * * Well-marked case of locomotor ataxia. * * * We see no evidence of excessive consumption of spirituous liquors.

One of the claims was that his diseased condition was due to his having been intemperate.

Owing to the imbecility of the applicant—

Now, I ask attention to this language—

Owing to the imbecility of the applicant and the total inability to obtain a complete history of the case, we are unable to determine positively whether the condition of the applicant is due to syphilis or other pathological changes.

This board, sitting at Covington, with this statement before them that this man had made that he had had this disease, were unable to determine whether his disability was due to this disease or to other pathological changes. That was on the 26th of August, 1891; and the claim was rejected. It was afterwards taken up at the request of Mr. Storer, a member of the Fifty-third Congress, and another examination was ordered, which took place on the 28th of March, 1894, before Drs. Dunham, Juettner, and Fogel, of the city of Cincinnati. They say:

We can not find any evidence of syphilis (soldier denies it also); no chancre scar; no enlarged glands. Palate relaxed, pharynx and nasal passages catarrhal, skin cyanotic but healthy; hair, skull, tibiae, and other bones normal; no evidence of vicious habits.

Another examination was ordered before this same board, because the Department was determined to prove that this man was suffering from the result of his vicious habits. This examination was made on the 9th of May, 1894, a little less than two months after the one last mentioned. In the report of this examination the board says:

Locomotor ataxia; sense of cushion beneath feet; coordination of movements in walking markedly impaired; he reels immediately upon closing eyes; marked unsteadiness of the voluntary movements of upper and lower extremities; patella reflex lost; difficulty in swallowing and speaking; sense of constriction about thorax; local areas of anesthesia of skin on thorax, neck, and legs. * * * There is a scar on both sides of meatus urinarius on glands penis. (Soldier claims as the result of a practical joke while in Camp Siegel, at Milwaukee. A comrade touched his glands penis with a red-hot ramrod.)

In spite—

Now, notice this language—

In spite of the most painstaking examination, according to special instruction, we can not find any evidence of syphilis on skull, hair, skin, tibiae, or other bones, mucous membrane, brain, heart, lungs, or other viscera and glands. There is positively no enlargement of the post cervical—

That is the gland at the back of the neck—

epitrochlear—

That is the gland on the arm above the elbow—and inguinal glands. It is the unanimous opinion of this board that claimant's locomotor ataxia is the result of exposure to wet and cold and rheumatism, not of syphilis.

No evidence of vicious habits.

Totally disabled for manual labor.

Now, with all this evidence before it, the Pension Department, still determined to harass this man and refuse him the pension to which he was entitled, sends him off 25 miles to the city of Hamilton for another examination. This is the sixth examination. On the 1st of August, 1894, he appeared before three doctors in Hamilton—Drs. Huston, Grafft, and Sharkey. After contradicting nearly everything found by former examinations, they say:

The cause of this trouble is probably a syphilitic germinata. There is a scar situated about the meatus and another scar situated near and on the right side of the meatus. No enlarged glands in the groin. No loss of hair. No nodes formed on the skull, but roughness of both tibiae.

There are the examinations into this case, and the Department, following, I am sorry to say, the usual rule in these cases, has determined that this man shall not get a pension, and they are construing every possible thing against him. Instead of doing as is provided for in the general bill that we now have under consideration; instead of giving this man the benefit of the doubt; instead of remembering that he risked his life in the service and came out of it a poor, crippled, broken-down man, requiring constant attendance, unable to control the natural functions of the body, filthy and diseased, and an absolute care and dependent upon his family, getting but $8 per month for rheumatism, where he is undoubtedly entitled, upon the report of these physicians, to the amount asked for in this bill, $30, they have construed everything against him, they have refused to allow him his pension, and it becomes necessary to appeal to this House to see that this injustice is righted.

Now, if the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ERDMAN] has the full statement of this case I should be very glad to have him read any parts of it that I have omitted if he wants to.

Mr. ERDMAN. Mr. Chairman, this case is of a character not proper for discussion in the open House, and I do not propose to be drawn into any discussion of the details of it. I want to say that this gentleman's pension was reduced in April, 1892, not under a Democratic Administration, and the implied fling at the present Administration, in the remarks of the gentleman who has just taken his seat; does not apply.

Mr. BROMWELL. May I ask the gentleman what remark I made which could be construed into any fling at the present Administration? Did I not say specifically that I did not propose to criticize the present Administration?

Mr. ERDMAN. Indeed, I heard you say that, but I judged your remarks by their general tenor. Now, in April, 1892, this man was reduced to $8 a month. The Pension Bureau then said:

Medical experience shows that 50 per cent of all cases of "locomotor ataxia" are due to syphilis and alcohol.

And I want to say that this man had admitted before that he formerly indulged freely in alcoholic stimulants and that he had the other disease.

The medical certificates show that in this case these are the principal if not sole factors in claimant's condition.

I have gone over the medical reports, and it is my judgment that the Pension Bureau in 1892 reported correctly:

Strict justice would seem to demand the dropping of his name from the rolls. Granting, however, that some disability may exist, due to long service and exposure and independent of the effects upon the nervous system of the syphilitic virus and alcoholic poisoning, all doubts are amply covered by the allowance of $8 per month.

A Republican Administration said that of him. If this is a proper case for pensioning by private bill in the House, then I have never seen an improper one.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall this bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation?

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. ERDMAN) there were—ayes 80, noes 4.

Mr. TALBERT. No quorum, Mr. Chairman.

Several MEMBERS. Count, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN (after counting). No quorum appears to be present, and the Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask if the gentleman will withdraw the point of no quorum, and allow this bill to be passed without prejudice?

Mr. TALBERT. If you will lay aside the bill with an unfavorable report, I will withdraw the point.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. TALBERT. I made a suggestion which gentlemen indignantly refused, and in their refusal made some unpleasant remarks. I refuse to withdraw the point of no quorum.

Mr. PICKLER. Let the bill be passed over without prejudice, without any report upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. LAYTON. I hope the bill will not be passed over. It is a meritorious case. I have examined it, and it is undoubtedly meritorious.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that my colleague, Mr. GARDNER, was called away by telegram on account of important business.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will rise.

The committee rose; and Mr. PAYNE resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, the Committee of the Whole House finding itself without a quorum, as Chairman I directed the roll to be called, when 116 members responded to their names. I report the names of the absentees for entry upon the Journal.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The names of the absentees will be entered upon the Journal. A quorum has appeared, and the committee will resume its session.

The committee again resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall this bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation?

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. TALBERT. I demand a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 97, noes 4. [Applause.]

So the bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

HELEN MORRELL CARROLL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 730) granting an increase of pension to Mrs. Helen Morrell Carroll. The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mrs. Helen Morrell Carroll, widow of Samuel Sprigg Carroll, late a major-general in the United States Army, at the rate of $75 per month, in lieu of the pension she is now receiving.

The question was taken on the amendment offered by Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire to strike out the words "seventy-five" and insert the word "fifty."

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on laying aside the bill with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I am constrained to take the same position in regard to this bill that I did when it came up several Friday evenings past, and in doing so I do not propose to detain the committee.

Mr. PICKLER. Yes, you do.

Mr. TALBERT. I want to state to the gentleman that no insinuation nor any of his rough language can deter me from doing what I think is right. The gentleman may be as long and as lean and as lank as he pleases, but it does not deter me. As I was going on to say, I do not propose to repeat what I have said on former occasions in regard to this discrimination in favor of the widows of major-generals. I am already on record on that proposition. Right here, bearing upon this subject, I desire to send to the desk and to have read a letter bearing upon questions of this kind, which I will ask the Clerk to read in my own time. I would be glad if gentlemen will listen to this letter. These are not my words, but the words of a soldier whom I do not know.

ERIE, PA., April 23, 1906.

DEAR SIR: I told you in my first letter that I may have more to say; but I gave up the notion until I saw the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of last Friday night and saw what you said about the pension of General Van Dever.

I said in my first letter, "You was right." I think so yet. Keep up your work. If Congress wants to do anything for us let them pass a service bill that will satisfy the boys all along the line.

How much better is General Logan's and General Sheridan's wife than mine to get $2,000 a year, because they had shoulder straps and sat on a horse while the boys tramped through the mud and slush? Oh, no!

Now for Mr. RAY, from New York. He asked what lunatic asylum I resided in. Tell him the same one that every man that voted for him to come to Congress.

[Laughter.]

He had better come here and see how much of a lunatic I am. He has not enough sense to be a "lunatic."

Any man that will stand up in his place in the Halls of Congress and talk like he does thirty years after the war and claims that he is a Republican, "and that the party is the friend of the men that made it possible for just such men to have a seat in Congress, show their gratitude toward us now."

You made him a good answer.

Respectfully,

CHARLES RICE.

Hon. J. W. TALBERT.

Mr. TALBERT. Now, Mr. Chairman, that letter speaks for itself. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "fifty" and inserting "thirty."

Mr. MILES. Mr. Chairman, this question was before the House in my absence a week ago. I regret that I was not here at that time to present some of the facts in this case, which I believe are not fully presented in the report. The report which is made in this case is the Senate report and was adopted by me with, I believe, no additions, and it goes without saying, Mr. Chairman, and I believe is admitted by my friend from South Carolina, that the distinguished soldier whose widow is asking a pension in this case had served his country brilliantly at Kernstown, Cedar Mountain, Gettysburg, Fredericksburg, Chancellorsville, the Wilderness, Spottsylvania, Petersburg, and all those great battlefields speak, and speak eloquently, of this man's service.

As to his widow, she is now lying in Providence Hospital, in this city, where she has been most of this winter. She is the war widow of Gen. Sprigg Carroll, and I sincerely regret—and I desire that every member of this House shall hear what I say—I sincerely regret that any amendment was offered to this bill which proposes to give this widow a pension of $75 per month. I hope the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CONNOLLY] will hereafter bear in mind that there are some Democrats who are not moved by economical considerations in recommending pensions for the widows of distinguished Union soldiers. [Applause.]

I am a Democrat, a Democrat by birth, the son of a Democrat, who was the son of a Democrat; I am a Democrat by training, a Democrat in every sense of the word, and am proud of it. But, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I deny that those of us who have served upon the minority of the Invalid Pensions Committee have been actuated by any motive of hostility to the soldiers in the positions which we have assumed with regard to pension legislation in the Fifty-fourth Congress. I bring you here a clean pension claim, in striking contrast with the one against which I stood up with four other members on this floor to vote proudly a while ago. It has been said of me and it is true, although only by accident, that I am constantly reporting to this House bills granting liberal pensions for generals or the widows of generals and men distinguished in the naval service of the country.

I am proud, sir, that that has been my good fortune, and I want to say to gentlemen on the other side of the House, whoever they were, who favored the first amendment proposed to this bill on last Friday evening—I want to say to them that as a Democrat, believing not in any distinctions in the English sense, I favor allowing more liberal pensions to the men, or to the widows of the men, who have won fame and added luster to American history than to the class of men to one of whom you awarded a pension of $25 a few moments ago, and I count myself fortunate that I have been by accident the champion here of the widows of the Union generals. She who was "last at the cross and earliest at the grave" will, in your pension legislation, add nothing unclean to the pension roll.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not know this lady. This is not a pension claim from my district or from my State. I desire simply in this connection that an affidavit which has been made by this invalid lady shall be read from the Clerk's desk, and when it shall have been read I trust that no man who stood up a while ago to vote in favor of a claimant to whom the granting of a pension is the granting of a badge of shame instead of a badge of honor will oppose this bill.

Mr. Chairman, I simply desire that this affidavit be read, and I beg pardon of the committee for having, with my usual earnestness, occupied so much time in presenting this case.

Mr. PICKLER. Will my colleague on the committee permit a suggestion?

Mr. MILES. Certainly.

Mr. PICKLER. I simply want to suggest that this bill passed the Senate in the Fifty-third Congress at $75 a month.

Mr. MILES. I ask that the Clerk now read the affidavit.

The affidavit was read, as follows:

Personally appeared before me, a notary public in and for the District of Columbia, Helen Morrell Carroll, who, being first duly sworn, deposes and says that she is the widow of the late Maj. Gen. Samuel Sprigg Carroll, and that she is now receiving a pension of $30 a month; that she is without property or means of support and entirely dependent upon said pension; that she is in very feeble health and has been ill for three years, finding it necessary on several occasions during said period to go to a hospital for treatment; that she is now confined by illness at Providence Hospital, this city; that some months ago she injured her right arm in letting a folding bed down, since which time she has been practically deprived of the use of it; that she had four children by General Carroll, two of whom are dead, a married daughter living, also a son, aged 19 years, who is employed at a very small salary, hardly enough to support him; that with the greatest economy and self-denial she finds it impossible to live on her pension of $30 a month, as her ill health and injured arm render it impossible to perform any work in self-support, and as she is constantly in need of medical treatment.

HELEN MORRELL CARROLL.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 23d day of April, A. D. 1906.

[SEAL.]

PAUL E. JOHNSON,

Notary Public, District of Columbia.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall this bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass?

Mr. TALBERT. I moved to amend the amendment, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. That motion was not in order and is not in order at this time.

Mr. MILES. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman. What is the original amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The original amendment was to strike out "seventy-five" and insert "fifty." The committee acted affirmatively upon that amendment, and the gentleman from South Carolina then proposed to strike out "fifty" and insert "thirty"; but that motion was not in order.

Mr. MILES. I move to strike out "fifty" and insert "seventy." The CHAIRMAN. That motion is not in order, the committee having inserted "fifty" by an affirmative vote.

Mr. MILES. Then I move to reconsider that vote. If that amendment is carried, I simply desire to say that the result will be that this lady will get no pension at all.

A MEMBER. Oh, no.

The CHAIRMAN. A motion to reconsider can not be made in Committee of the Whole. The question is, Shall this bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation?

The question being taken, it was decided in the affirmative; and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MIRIAM V. KENNEY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8937) granting a pension to Miriam V. Kenney, widow of Samuel W. Kenney.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That a pension of $25 per month be, and the same is hereby, granted to Mrs. Miriam V. Kenney, widow of Samuel W. Kenney, during the term of her natural life, together with the sum of $5,000 for the services of her late husband during the war of the rebellion.

The amendment reported by the Committee on Pensions was read, as follows:

Strike out at the end of the bill the words "together with the sum of $5,000 for the services of her late husband during the war of the rebellion."

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, the report which I desire to have read will fully explain this claim. The case is one which has been very fully investigated by the other members of the committee as well as by myself. If, after the reading of the report, any explanation should be desired, I think I can answer satisfactorily every inquiry which may be made.

The report (by Mr. Wood) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2867) granting a pension to Miriam V. Kenney, widow of Samuel W. Kenney, submit the following report:

The evidence in this case discloses that Miriam V. Kenney was the lawful wife of Samuel W. Kenney, and has remained his wife since his death.

Samuel W. Kenney was employed and paid by and under direction of Gen. James S. Negley, commanding a division of the Army of the Cumberland, as a spy to seek information of the Confederate army, its position and intentions, and in January, 1863, he went into the Confederate lines, under the above authority and for the above purpose, and while on such duty was captured by the Confederates, tried and convicted as a spy, and was hanged as a spy at Tallahoma, Tenn., February 13, 1863.

The evidence in this case is voluminous, and a considerable portion of it is from Confederate archives, including the record of the court-martial which tried and convicted Kenney. Letters from General Negley have also been considered by the committee. There is no controversy or contradiction in the above facts nor that Kenney was from the first a Union man.

The claimant applied for a pension, which was rejected on the ground that Samuel W. Kenney was not in the military or naval service of the United States.

Your committee recommend that the bill be amended by striking out the last two lines, and that as amended the same do pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. ERDMAN. Will the gentleman in charge of this case give us a little more information relative to the employment and compensation of the man whose widow it is now proposed to pension? This is a new class of people whom we are asked to pension—spies. Possibly we ought to grant pensions in these cases, where the employment is demonstrated and where, as stated in this case, the spy was hanged by the enemy. But the evidence in a case of this kind ought to be very clear. I hope we shall have some explanation, therefore, from the gentleman in charge of this bill.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, I shall very gladly give to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ERDMAN] and to this Committee of the Whole all the information that has come to the Committee on Invalid Pensions in reference to this case. We found among the papers a certified copy of the record of the Confederate court-martial by which this man was tried, convicted, and executed as a spy. We found a very considerable amount of evidence, both Union and Confederate, to show that he was a Union man from the first. The circumstances are developed particularly in a letter of Gen. James S. Negley, who commanded a division of the Army of the Cumberland in the operations of that army immediately preceding the battle of Stone River, on the 1st of January, 1863. I have before me a copy of that letter, and will read it if desired, or I can give the substance of it.

Mr. ERDMAN. What officers constituted the court-martial that convicted this man?

Mr. WOOD. I am unable to say. I recollect that the court-martial was ordered by General Wood—I think Gen. S. A. M. Wood—of the Confederate army, commanding at Tallahoma, Tenn. I could send for the papers on file in the committee room and read the entire record, or a full exhibition of the case may be found in the records of the Pension Office.

Samuel W. Kenney was a Pennsylvanian by birth, coming from Armstrong County. He was a resident of the State of Tennessee. When the Union Army approached there he came to our lines to save his life, having been recognized as a Union man and driven out. He was acquainted with a number of the members of the Seventy-eighth Pennsylvania, a regiment of that Army; and General Negley, in his letter, which I have before me, states that he frequently employed Kenney as a spy and found him to be a brave and true man. Let me read a moment.

Mr. ERDMAN. I do not think it is necessary to occupy time in reading. I would like to know what rank this man held. Was he an enlisted man, a scout, or what was he?

Mr. WOOD. He was employed by General Negley, as that officer himself says, as a scout and spy. He penetrated the Confederate lines at General Negley's request for the purpose of ascertaining the forces and the intentions of the Confederate army, which lay at Murfreesboro.

Sir, there is a statue set up in New York to the memory of a spy whose name has been honored by his country—Nathan Hale. The services of this man Kenney were necessary; they were bravely and honorably performed. There is only one thing wrong, it seems to me, in regard to this bill. This woman ought to have been pensioned from the very day of the execution of her husband. [Applause.] The provision for paying her $5,000 was struck out—not because she was not considered as deserving it, but simply because a majority of the committee felt that they were not justified in paying anything in the nature of arrearages of pension. If there is anything wrong about the bill it is the amendment proposed by the committee, and for one I should be glad to have that amendment disagreed to, and the bill passed unamended, thus giving this woman the amount of money originally specified.

The question being taken on the amendment reported by the committee, it was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

MARY F. DAVENPORT.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 75) granting a pension to Mary F. Davenport.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension roll the name of Mary F. Davenport, widow of Dudley Davenport, late first lieutenant of the steamer Caleb Cushing, and pay her a pension at the rate of $50 per month.

The report (by Mr. POOLE) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 75) granting a pension to Mary F. Davenport, widow of Dudley Davenport, submit the following:

Dudley Davenport was a first lieutenant of the revenue cutter Caleb Cushing during the late war of the rebellion. The evidence examined by your committee includes a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury dated April 21, 1863, which says:

"The records of the Department show that the revenue cutter Cushing was captured by a Confederate privateer in Portland Harbor, Maine, on the night of the 26th of June, 1863. She was at the time in command of Lieutenant Davenport, Captain Clark, who had been in command, having died on that date in the city of Portland.

"The Cushing, with the other vessels of the service, was under orders by the President dated June 14, 1863, to cooperate with the Navy in arresting rebel depredations on American commerce, etc."

At the time of the capture of the Cushing by the rebel privateer, great cruelty was shown Lieutenant Davenport by his captors, it being known to them that he was a native of Georgia who had remained loyal to the Union; that his life was threatened and he was placed in irons; that armed vessels of the United States pursued the privateer and the Cushing, and that finally Lieutenant Davenport and his crew were placed in small boats and abandoned in midocean, and the Cushing blown up.

As part of the evidence in this case is a letter to Lieutenant Davenport from Hon. S. P. Chase, Secretary of the Treasury, dated July 14, 1863, which says, in part:

"I am pleased to say that your conduct while a prisoner on the cutter Cushing in refusing to furnish any information whatever to her rebel captors meets my most cordial and unqualified approval."

The evidence presented in this claim shows conclusively that before and up to the capture of the Cushing by the rebel privateer, that Lieutenant Davenport had been an exceptionally strong and hearty man, but that the mental strain and anxiety, together with personal abuse received at that time, produced a very marked change in him; melancholia was developed, which soon resulted in insanity, and that he was confined in an asylum at New Rochelle, N. Y., and afterwards at Utica, N. Y., where he died May 9, 1869. Affidavits of well-known citizens of Oswego, N. Y., where he resided, are exhibited, which show that from the time of his arrival home, after the capture of the Cushing, about July 15, that he was undoubtedly insane.

Mary F. Davenport, the wife of Lieutenant Davenport, made application to the Commissioner of Pensions for a pension as the widow of Dudley Davenport, alleging that his death was the direct result of the hardship, suffering, mental strain, and exposure endured at the time of the capture of the Cushing by the rebel privateer on the 26th of June, 1863.

The claim was rejected July 19, 1890 "on the ground of no existing law granting pensions to widows of officers who served in the Revenue-Marine Service."

There is no dispute about the facts in this claim, and as all the evidence goes to show that the mind of Lieutenant Davenport became shattered, ending in total insanity and death, all resulting from the capture of the vessel commanded by Lieutenant Davenport by an armed vessel of the enemy. There is no equitable reason why the relief sought for in this bill should not be granted. It further appears from the testimony that Mary F. Davenport was married to Lieutenant Davenport on the 9th day of July, 1862; that she is entirely destitute and has been for several years partially blind, having to remain in a darkened room a large portion of the time, and that she is now dependent for her support upon the bounty of friends, and that she has no children.

Considering all the evidence in this claim, which evidence is from the leading citizens of Oswego, N. Y., as well as physicians of the asylum where said Davenport was confined, and the documentary evidence furnished by the Government, your committee believe that this is a case where special legislation only can afford relief that seems to be just, and therefore recommend the passage of the bill H. R. 75 with an amendment striking out the word "fifty" in the last line and inserting "twenty-five."

The amendment recommended by the Committee on Invalid Pensions was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

HARRIET WOODBURY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1299) to pension Harriet Woodbury, of Windsor, Vt.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the general pension laws, the name of Harriet Woodbury, late widow of Aaron G. Firman, of Company I, Seventh Regiment Vermont Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. SULLOWAY) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1299) to pension Harriet Woodbury, having carefully considered the same, respectfully submit the following report:

The petitioner was formerly the widow of Aaron G. Firman, who served in Company I, Seventh Vermont Volunteers, from November 26, 1863, until his death in the service, October 2, 1864; the widow was pensioned from the death of the soldier to July 14, 1866, when she again married; pension was then paid to a minor child of soldier until October 29, 1890, when he became 16 years of age, since which date no pension has been paid. These facts are shown by the records of the Pension Bureau.

The petitioner, Harriet Woodbury, of Windsor, Vt., testifies that after her marriage to Samuel H. Woodbury she was compelled to go out to labor to support herself and invalid husband, and that he lingered along until July 26, 1866, when he died of cancer; that since his death she is left without any means, and is now obliged to earn her subsistence by laboring at 25 cents per day, and that such remuneration is all the income she has.

Samuel H. B. Emery, of Bartonville, Vt., corroborates the above, and testifies that the petitioner's husband (Woodbury), while apparently healthy when she married him, was afterwards afflicted with cancer, and that the petitioner had to labor for their support; that Mr. Woodbury died in 1866, leaving his widow without means, and that she now labors for her daily bread, and hardly earns enough for a support.

Similar bills were favorably reported in the Fifty-second and Fifty-third Congresses, but died on the Calendar.

Your committee recommend that the bill be amended by adding to line 8 the words "and pay her a pension of $12 per month"; and that as amended the bill do pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. ERDMAN. Mr. Chairman, I suggest to the gentleman in charge of this bill that he allow it to be laid aside without prejudice for the present. It is another case of a remarried widow, and those cases always take up the time of the committee. Other good bills might be passed while we are considering this one.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman to lay this bill aside?

Mr. GROUT. I object.

Mr. ERDMAN. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. GROUT. I hope the gentleman will not take up the time in discussing this matter. This whole question has been gone through with heretofore very fully; and it has been ascertained that the committee is in favor of these bills, where, as in this case, the widow is destitute, and dependent wholly upon her own exertions.

Mr. ERDMAN. Mr. Chairman, we are considering to-day, and have been for a day or two past, a general pension bill, and widows of this class are carefully excluded from the provisions of that bill. You had your opportunity, if you are going to pension every widow who remarried, to do it by general legislation, and you did not choose to avail yourself of that opportunity. You propose, on the contrary, to do it by private bills, and in that manner to do injustice to all others who have not a member of Congress here to make an effort in their behalf or to look after their interests.

Mr. PICKLER. Will the gentleman allow me a suggestion?

Mr. ERDMAN. Certainly.

Mr. PICKLER. As I have already said several times during the course of this discussion, we have added no new classes to this general administrative bill.

Mr. ERDMAN. Oh, yes; you do.

Mr. PICKLER. No, sir; not one.

Mr. ERDMAN. Oh, yes; this bill embraces in the first paragraph a certain class, and in the third and thirteenth paragraphs.

Mr. PICKLER. Not by any manner of means. These were always pensioned and pensionable until this Administration. This is not anything new in that line.

Mr. ERDMAN. They were never pensioned, I think.

Mr. PICKLER. Always.

Mr. ERDMAN. Under Order 164, an erroneous order, admittedly erroneous by General Bussey, after 300,000 pensioners had been placed on the rolls, you propose again to admit those who were placed there by this erroneous order or erroneous ruling of the Department.

Was it any wonder, when this Administration came into power, when, by the admission of General Bussey on his own ruling, there had been an erroneous construction, placing 300,000 men on the rolls—I say, was it any wonder that they should be careful and scrutinize the claims of the various claimants? And yet you propose to put them again on the rolls, notwithstanding the admission that that order was erroneous, by your general pension bill.

Now, in the proviso of the second paragraph you carefully exclude remarried widows, so that perchance you may have an opportunity every Friday, or soon, to bring up a special case to demonstrate to the country particularly that you are the friends of the remarried and divorced widows.

But, Mr. Chairman, I had occasion in the Fifty-third Congress to express my views at length upon this subject, and I will send the same to the desk to have read now; and I would be very much delighted to see one gentleman on the other side rise and controvert any one of the arguments or any single position therein set forth.

The Clerk read as follows:

The purpose of this bill is to restore to the pension roll, as widow of a soldier who died in 1864, his former widow who remarried in 1866 and lived with her second husband until he died in 1898. The minority have had occasion to express their views heretofore in cases of this character, and the statement made in report No. 601 on the bill (H. R. 3008) to pension Martha E. Miller, which is equally applicable to this case, is as follows:

To pass this bill is to nullify for the benefit of this one individual the substantial limitation of the general laws that the pension of soldiers' widows who have remarried shall cease.

The objections to be urged against such bills as this are numerous. In the first place, it makes an exception of a case which is in no wise exceptional. There may be varying degrees of destitution in different cases, but it may be fairly stated that all cases of widows who have remarried and again become husbandless by reason of death or divorce present the same substantial conditions.

If any widow so situated should be restored to pension all widows so situated should be restored, and this by general enactment and not by individual private bills, whereby those who may happen to have a friend to espouse their cause secure a benefit which the modest and the unknown never think of seeking. Special pension acts are justifiable only in cases which are essentially exceptional and should not be used to grant to one that which is denied to the many, whose situation is precisely the same. But aside from this consideration, however, the soldier's widow who remarries voluntarily relinquishes her pension because she prefers to do so.

The Government can not become an insurer against an unfortunate termination of this second matrimonial venture either by divorce or death. To restore pension in case of divorce is to encourage remarried widows to seek divorces, and, in any event, it is to give them an ostensible claim upon the soldier's death and memory which they have long since renounced by preference.

Furthermore, it is not to be assumed that legislation of this character is in the line of justice or of honor to the soldiers themselves, or that it is necessarily desired or favored by the soldier classes.

A contribution from the public Treasury to the support of the widow of the soldier so long as she remains his widow, every soldier, perhaps, desires, and the common consent of the nation for thirty years has sanctioned this, but that each soldier looks forward to and desires that his services and his memory shall be the basis of a pension to his wife at some remote day beyond an intervening period of matrimonial alliance with some other husband is by no means self-evident or fairly to be presumed.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Pennsylvania is criticising the Committee on Invalid Pensions, saying that we have made a new class of pensioners in the general bill under discussion in the House at the day session, in which class Confederate soldiers are admitted to pensions. I call attention to the decision in the case of Daniel B. Garrison (6 Pension Decisions, 289), rendered March 11, 1893, where it is expressly decided that the Confederate soldier who afterwards went into the Union Army was entitled to a pension. The gentleman said it was a new class of pensioners. He is mistaken. Under the last Administration they were pensionable. I can assert that there is not a new class of pensioners in the general bill.

Mr. ERDMAN. If that is the construction of this Department, why pass the law at all?

Mr. PICKLER. Well, the present Administration have started out the other way. That is the only trouble.

Mr. ERDMAN. You say that decision was rendered in 1893?

Mr. PICKLER. Yes; March 11, 1893. There are several decisions to that effect, so that the gentleman ought not to say we are putting on any new class.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me this is rather an exceptional case. The pension asked for is very small indeed. This is a very deserving lady, the widow of a private soldier. [Applause.] While I am disposed to oppose the granting of a pension to any widow who has remarried, whose husband is still alive, it seems to me that this is an exceptional case. She only drew a pension for two years, and then remarried, and her husband only lived a short time. She was an invalid during that time. It does seem to me that there is some merit in this bill. [Applause and cries of "Vote!"] You have just passed a bill giving $50 a month to the widow of a major-general. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MILES] stood up here and pleaded eloquently for her because she was in the hospital, and he openeth not his mouth here now, when we are considering the case of a widow of a poor private, and that widow is working up in Vermont, as I understand from the report of the committee, for only 25 cents a day.

Mr. PICKLER. That is correct.

Mr. TALBERT. I want to say also, Mr. Chairman, that is a sad commentary upon these wide-mouthed orators who have been standing up here, day in and day out, proclaiming their love for the soldier and the soldier's widow, when there are such widows living at their doors earning the pitiful sum of 25 cents a day. It is a shame and a disgrace upon your heads, and I want to call the attention of this House to the fact. I am ready and willing, as a rebuke to the pretended friends of soldiers, to vote this $12 a month to this poor woman, to make out a supplement to that pitiful little sum of 25 cents a day which you permit her to work for there, while you stand up here and make hypocritical speeches of love for the soldier, for his vote, and let his widow perish at your very doors. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment proposed by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

MARY E. WYSE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4913) granting a pension to Mrs. Mary E. Wyse, widow of Lieut. Col. F. O. Wyse.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc. That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the general pension laws, the name of Mrs. Mary E. Wyse, widow of the late Francis O. Wyse, lieutenant-colonel Fourth Regiment United States Artillery, at the rate of $30 per month.

Mr. ERDMAN. Let us have the report, Mr. Chairman.
The report (by Mr. COFFIN) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4013) granting a pension to Mrs. Mary E. Wyse, have considered the same, and respectfully report as follows:

Francis O. Wyse, the claimant's deceased husband, entered the United States Military Academy September 1, 1833, and was appointed brevet second lieutenant, Third Artillery, July 1, 1837; promoted to second lieutenant July 31, 1837; to first lieutenant July 31, 1838; captain March 3, 1847; major Fourth Artillery May 14, 1861, and lieutenant-colonel Fourth Artillery November 1, 1861.

He resigned July 25, 1863, but was reappointed and retired February 28, 1879, under an act of February 15, 1849, as an additional lieutenant-colonel, United States Army.

Colonel Wyse participated in three wars (Indian, Mexican, and civil) during the period of his service, and his conduct throughout was marked by great gallantry and bravery. In the report of a joint committee of the Senate and House of Representatives at the first session of the Thirty-third Congress is contained a complimentary notice of efficient conduct on the part of the soldier and his junior officers, and gives them great credit for their services.

The record shows that in April, 1859, Colonel Wyse (then a captain and brevet major) received an injury of left ankle joint and fracture of the external malleolus from a fall of his horse, and the testimony on file in the pension claim of the widow shows that he continued to be seriously affected by this injury until his death, which occurred January 21, 1893.

A printed report, dated July 18, 1847, contained in a copy of the Tampico (Mexico) Sentinel (newspaper) bestows the highest praise upon Captain Wyse for the conduct of himself and men in an engagement near the Calaboso River, Mexico, about July 11, 1847.

The report was made by L. G. De Russy, colonel Louisiana Volunteers, who commanded the United States forces in the engagement, and repeatedly commends Captain Wyse for his courage and gallantry.

After the death of the soldier the widow filed an application for pension, and the proof established the fact that his death was due to causes originating in the service and line of duty, but the Pension Bureau rejected the claim on the ground that the fatal disease had its inception in a time of peace prior to March 4, 1861, and hence there is no law under which the widow can be allowed a pension. The officials of the Pension Office concede, however, that the disease originated during the soldier's military service and in line of duty, and the rejection is based wholly upon the absence of law under which the widow can be pensioned when the soldier's fatal disease originated during a time of peace prior to March 4, 1861.

The soldier held the rank of captain at the time of contracting the disease (bronchitis) from which he died, and in the light of the foregoing facts and circumstances your committee believe that it would be but an act of justice to allow his widow the usual pension granted to the widows of captains.

The bill is therefore returned with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

GEN. WILLIAM H. MORRIS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4383) granting a pension to Gen. William H. Morris.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc. That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William H. Morris, late a brevet major-general of volunteers in the Army of the United States, at the rate of $100 per month, in lieu of the pension which he is now receiving.

Mr. ERDMAN. Let us have the report read.

The report (by Mr. McCLELLAN) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4383) granting a pension to Gen. William H. Morris, have examined the same, and report as follows:

William H. Morris was born in 1827. He was graduated from West Point with the class of 1851, and commenced his military career as a lieutenant in the Second United States Infantry, then stationed at Fort Yuma, Cal. At the outbreak of the war of the rebellion he was assigned to duty, with the rank of captain, as the assistant adjutant-general and chief of the staff of Maj. Gen. John J. Peck, in the Army of the Potomac. He served through the peninsula campaigns with great credit.

He was commissioned colonel of the Sixth New York Volunteer Artillery on September 2, 1862, and was ordered with his regiment to Baltimore, which was then being threatened by Stonewall Jackson's army, only 40 miles away, at Frederick. The rebels having been driven back out of Maryland by the Army of the Potomac, Morris was placed in command of Fort McHenry and his regiment added to its garrison. Soon after he was ordered to Harper's Ferry. While there he was promoted to the rank of brigadier-general, and placed in charge of Maryland Heights, with a force consisting of the Sixth Regiment New York Artillery, regiments of infantry and cavalry, and batteries of heavy guns.

When Maryland Heights were abandoned, by order of the War Department, General Morris was ordered to join the Third Corps in the Army of the Potomac. A brigade was organized for him, consisting of the Sixth Regiment New York Artillery and the following regiments of infantry: The Fourteenth New Jersey, the Tenth Vermont, the One hundred and fifty-first New York Volunteers. General Morris was in the reserve at the battle of Gettysburg July 1 to 3, 1863, and engaged in the action of Wapping Heights July 21, 1863. Not long after this time the Sixth New York Regiment of Artillery was ordered to join the artillery reserve of the Army of the Potomac.

General Morris was conspicuous in the action of Locust Grove, November 23, 1863.

In the reorganization of the Army of the Potomac the Third Corps was broken up; one part sent to join the Second Corps, and the other part, with General Morris, was added to the Sixth Corps. The new brigade formed for him consisted of the One hundred and sixth New York, the One hundred and fifty-first New York, the Fourteenth New Jersey, the Tenth Vermont, and the Eighty-seventh Pennsylvania Regiment Volunteer Infantry. In the Richmond campaign under Grant General Morris was constantly engaged, taking an important part in the battle of the Wilderness.

At the action near Spottsylvania, May 9, 1864, General Morris was shot through the leg by a sharpshooter, and rendered unfit for further service in the field.

After some months passed in the hospital at Georgetown General Morris was ordered to report to General Dix for court-martial duty in New York, and continued on light duty until the close of the war, when he was honorably mustered out of service. The brevet rank of major-general, United States Volunteers, was conferred upon him by the President of the United States March 13, 1863, "for gallant and meritorious services in the battle of the Wilderness, Virginia."

General Morris represented Putnam County, N. Y., in the constitutional convention of 1867, and was chief of ordnance and inspector-general in the National Guard of the State of New York.

General Morris has lately been suffering from a complication of diseases which has made him a chronic invalid, unable to earn his living—a serious consideration to a man who has all his life been obliged to depend on his own exertions for his means of support.

In view of the very distinguished services of General Morris, and of his record as a gallant soldier, your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. TALBERT. I should like to ask what is the amount of pension asked for by this gentleman? I did not catch it from the reading of the report.

The CHAIRMAN. One hundred dollars a month. The question is, Shall this bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation?

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out "one hundred" and insert "seventy-five."

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. TALBERT. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "seventy-five" and inserting "fifty."

Mr. PICKLER. This is an application on the part of the soldier himself.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Mr. Chairman, I hope that neither of these amendments will prevail. There have been two things I have done in regard to pension matters. One is to come here every Friday night and hold my peace, content to only vote for the soldiers' pensions, realizing how valuable the time is to the soldiers who are seeking pensions through Congress. But when a motion is made by the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions to amend a unanimous report, resulting from an examination into the record of General Morris, I feel it incumbent upon me to speak. The other thing I have done is never to introduce a bill in Congress for a pension without first examining into the merits of the case myself.

This matter was first called to my attention by the only Republican predecessor that I have had in Congress from my district in the history of the Republican party—Hon. William H. Robertson, who served a term in this House at the close of the war. After receiving the bill from him, and after it had been introduced by me without conversing with or request from any of the individuals who subsequently communicated with me, then, for the first time, I learned, in addition to the brilliant record of General Morris disclosed by my previous investigation, how warm a place he had in the hearts of those who served under him during the four years of war. Those who listened to the reading of the report learned that he served in California several years before the rebellion. He resigned from the Regular Army because of loss of health. Ten years elapsed, and the war of the rebellion broke out. Immediately he enlisted, and served as commander of volunteers throughout the war.

I shall not take the time of this House, after the reading of the report, in going over his military record, but I want to call the attention of this committee and the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, who has offered one of these amendments, to the fact that if, in addition to the evidence of his brave services, the testimony of the private soldiers who served under him as to the place a commander holds in the hearts of the soldiers has anything to do with granting $100 per month pension to a man in his old age, with a wife and child dependent upon him for support, then this bill should pass for $100 a month.

Mr. WILLIS. What is the financial condition of General Morris?

Mr. FAIRCHILD. He is without means, and is unable to support himself and family.

Mr. MILES. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Certainly.

Mr. MILES. How old is General Morris?

Mr. FAIRCHILD. He was born April 22, 1827.

Mr. MILES. Then he is over 69 years of age.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. He is over 69 years of age. He is an invalid, broken down, unable to leave his house, with his wife and child dependent upon him for support.

Now, I want to call the attention of this committee, before they vote in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. PICKLER], to the resolutions that were sent to me the moment it was announced in the papers that the bill had been introduced. I will not take the time of the committee, when time is so valuable, to read the resolutions from every one of the Grand Army posts I have in my hand, but I will read just one that came to me from the grand council of the Union Veterans' Protective Association:

At a regular meeting of the grand council of the Union Veterans' Protective Association, March 4, 1896, the following preamble and resolution were unanimously adopted:

"Whereas the Hon. BENJAMIN L. FAIRCHILD, member of Congress, has introduced in the United States House of Representatives a bill to increase the pension of Gen. William H. Morris: Therefore

"Resolved, That the grand council of the Union Veterans' Protective Association is much gratified at this action of Congressman FAIRCHILD as a well-deserved reward for the military services of General Morris, who distinguished himself as chief of General Peck's staff through the Peninsular campaign under McClellan; took, with his brigade, a prominent part in the Rapidan campaign under Meade, and commanded a chosen brigade in the renowned Sixth Corps, Army of the Potomac, in the Richmond campaign under Grant, and was recommended by his division commander, Gen. James B. Ricketts, and his corps commander, Gen. Horatio G. Wright, for the brevet rank of major-general, for gallant and meritorious conduct in the battle of the Wilderness, Virginia," which honor was conferred upon him by the President of the United States."

C. P. QUINTARD,
Recording Secretary.

A true copy from the records of the grand council, Union Veterans' Protective Association.

WM. C. YORKE,
Corresponding Secretary.

I have in my hand similar resolutions from the John C. Fremont Post, No. 590, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of New York; Oliver Tilden Post, No. 96, Department of New York; Grand Army of the Republic; Judson Kilpatrick Post, No. 143, Department of New York; Grand Army of the Republic; and also G. K. Warren Council, No. 4, Union Veterans' Protective Association, Fordham, New York City, besides letters from commanders of other posts. It is said of George Washington, he was "First in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen." And I think it will be agreed that the statement that he was first in the hearts of his countrymen has as much to do with the position he occupies in the world's history as the statement that he was first in war and first in peace.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. FAIRCHILD. I will.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Can you give the committee the age of that dependent child?

Mr. FAIRCHILD. I do not know it; but I will state to the gentleman from New Hampshire that I made several inquiries and that I received information from various sources that in addition to his wife he has a child dependent upon him for support; and I have the impression that the reason of that is the invalid condition of the child; but that part of it I can not vouch for.

Mr. SULLOWAY. I think it is an invalid daughter.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Now, I say it is likewise true that it is not only the deeds on the battlefields that is disclosed from the reports of his army record, but it is also the position that he occupied in the hearts of his comrades and those that served under him that distinguishes a deserving general. I have with me numerous letters from privates which I will not attempt to read. But I will give one extract from one of these letters. It is a sample of numbers I have received, coming continuously from day to day, from these men scattered throughout different parts of the country who had read in the papers that the bill had been introduced:

As an old comrade of General Morris, I thank you for what you are doing for him and pray that you may succeed. I know what the general was worth from 1861 to 1865, and know that he is old and feeble and almost in want, and I had him, at the last meeting of the Sixth New York Heavy Artillery Association, as a mark of respect, made the president of the association. The general was too old and feeble to attend the meeting, but the nomination and his election were made with cheers and unanimously.

That, Mr. Chairman, is a sample of the letters that I have received from the privates of General Morris's command. From historians also commendations come. From the compiler of the Townsend Library of National, State, and Individual Record, now the property of Columbia College, is received a strong indorsement that reminds me that General Morris is the descendant of two signers of the Declaration of Independence, and a son of the author of "Woodman, spare that tree." From the Westchester County Historical Society I receive strong resolutions urging the amount named in this bill.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I earnestly ask that the amendments, both of them, be defeated.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to state briefly my reasons for offering the amendment to the amendment, proposing to strike out "seventy-five" and insert "fifty." This claimant was undoubtedly a distinguished officer, and he deserves credit for his service to the country; but he is now drawing $30 a month, and the Committee on Invalid Pensions have recommended increasing his pension to $100 a month, and I think $50 is a happy medium between the two. This great Government of ours is built upon concession and compromise, and now let us come together in this matter and agree upon a compromise and give this distinguished gentleman $50 a month.

Mr. MILES. Why?

Mr. TALBERT. I have already stated the reasons; and I would be glad if I could get gentlemen who shed these crocodile tears over the generals and their widows here night after night to help me to get a pension for some poor widow that is working for 25 cents a day. I am sorry, too, that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROWELL], who spoke so eloquently this evening in his effort to get a pension for a man who ought not to have it, has seen fit, after getting that bill through, to take his hat and leave this Hall. [Laughter.] I am sorry, also, that I do not see in his seat the distinguished Mr. ROWLAND BLENNERHASSETT MAHANY, from New York, who has such a long biography in the Congressional Directory, which he was ashamed to hear read here, and who was so loud-mouthed in behalf of the soldiers—I am sorry that his seat also is vacant this evening.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I would like to call the attention of the gentleman from South Carolina to the fact—

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from South Carolina yield?

Mr. TALBERT. Certainly; I always yield to the distinguished gentleman from McKinley—Ohio, I mean. [Laughter.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. I thought that possibly the distinguished gentleman from South Carolina might not know that the young gentleman from New York [Mr. MAHANY] was not present, as I supposed that he would not make that sort of allusion to a gentleman who was absent. Possibly, however, I may have put a wrong estimate upon the gentlemanly character of the distinguished gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. TALBERT. I do not care anything about the opinion of the gentleman at all. [Laughter.] I stated that I was sorry that the distinguished gentleman from New York who saw fit to read other people's biographies here had run away and that his seat was vacant. If that is treason, make the most of it. Take me down and hang me up again. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to say in relation to this bill that I think $50 is ample for General Morris. I do not wish to deny anything that was said in his behalf by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FAIRCHILD]. He was undoubtedly a distinguished officer and deserves great credit for his services, but I think $50 a month will pay him very well when we consider the pitiful sums that we are allowing to the private soldiers and their widows all along the line. I hope gentlemen will open their eyes to the fact that they are doing injustice to these private soldiers, and that here now, once for all, we shall put our foot down upon the business of granting these high pensions to officers and officers' widows, and I am glad to see in his seat the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McCALL], who became converted on this subject several evenings ago, and I hope to have his assistance in this matter. [Laughter.]

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, I am very glad that the Committee of the Whole can understand this evening something of the position of the Committee on Invalid Pensions and something of the appeals that are constantly made to it. Since you have listened to the eloquent, touching, and really, to a great extent, convincing words of the distinguished young gentleman from New York [Mr. FAIRCHILD] in behalf of this aged Union soldier, you are better able to understand something of the appeals that come every day to the Committee on Invalid Pensions. I appreciate what the gentleman from New York has said about this case. I did not know that this was his bill, though if I had known it that would not have made any difference. I did not know whose bill it was. The Committee on Invalid Pensions have been criticised night after night because they have reported in some cases larger pensions for officers and the widows of officers than they have recommended for privates.

The amendment which I have offered to this bill proposes to put this pension at $75 a month. That is $900 a year, and I suggest to my friend from New York that $900 a year ought to keep in comfort any man with so small a family as that of General Morris. I think this amount ought to provide him with the comforts of life. My sympathies are as much aroused in his favor as any gentleman's can be. But this committee has been criticised time and again; and notwithstanding the records and petitions and letters which have been presented here in this case, if this bill goes through granting a pension of $100 a month, the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TALBERT] and gentlemen from other parts of the country will be flooding the RECORD here next Friday night with outcries from private soldiers that we are putting these pensions too high.

I am in favor of giving this old soldier what will keep him comfortably for the remainder of his life; I am unwilling that he should suffer want or distress. But, Mr. Chairman, when the private soldier to whom we grant a pension is obliged in many cases to live on $144 a year, or if he should be in the condition of this man, might get $30 a month or $360 a year, regardless of what family he might have, I do think in fairness to the private soldier and all others concerned that when we pension this man at $900 a year it ought to be sufficient.

I am loath to differ with gentlemen who have so eloquently presented the claim of this old soldier. But I believe it is the duty of members of this committee to live up to their professions and to reduce this pension to $75 a month. Not only will this amount keep this man in comfort, beyond the reach of want, but I do not doubt that if the bill goes through with a pension of $900 a year the beneficiary will be surprised at the success of his distinguished Representative in getting the bill through in so liberal a shape. The bill was reported in the Fifty-first Congress at $50 a month, and that was a very liberal Congress for pensions. It was reported in the last House at $50 a month. And now, if we pass it at $75 a month, we shall be doing, I think, our full duty in the case.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman will allow me to ask why his committee reports a bill to pay $100 a month, and then on the floor moves to reduce the amount to $75 a month?

Mr. PICKLER. Let me say to the gentleman that since these bills were reported there has been a very decided expression on the floor of this House that probably bills of this kind have been reported at too high a figure. Let me say that while I am disposed to stand by my committee, yet individually I am not in favor of any of these high pensions. I am in favor of proper distinctions between officers and privates, because such a policy is in accord with the history of this Government. But I am not in favor of these unwarranted distinctions. That has not been my disposition in committee and it is not here. I believe it is unfair to the private soldier to put these pensions for officers and their widows at so high figures as some gentlemen here seem to favor.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Allow me to say a single word in reply to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. PICKLER]. He has stated that this bill was reported for a less amount in previous Congresses. Sir, this bill as reported in the Senate in 1891 was for $100 a month; as it passed the Senate it granted that amount; and it only failed in the House because it came here too late for consideration before the final adjournment.

Mr. PICKLER. Oh, no; the bill has always been reported to this House at $50 a month.

The question being taken on Mr. TALBERT's amendment to the amendment of Mr. PICKLER, there were on a division (called for by Mr. TALBERT)—ayes 17, noes 64.

Mr. TALBERT. No quorum.

Several MEMBERS. Do not make that point.

The CHAIRMAN (after a count). One hundred and three members are present. The noes have it; and the amendment to the amendment is rejected.

The question then recurring on the amendment of Mr. PICKLER to strike out "$100" and insert "$75," it was agreed to, there being—ayes 78, noes 20.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be favorably reported to the House.

MARY L. BACON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5400) to increase the pension of Mary L. Bacon, widow of the late George B. Bacon, late Lieutenant-commander of the United States Navy.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act there be allowed and paid to Mary L. Bacon, widow of the late George B. Bacon, Lieutenant-commander, United States Navy, a pension at the rate of $40 per month during her widowhood, in place of $30 per month, which she is now receiving.

The report (by Mr. HOWE) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5400) granting an increase of pension to Mary L. Bacon, have considered the same and report:

Mrs. Bacon is the widow of the late Lieut. Commander George B. Bacon, of the United States Navy, who passed through all the grades from midshipman, to which he was appointed October 10, 1864, to Lieutenant-commander, the rank held by him at the time of his honorable resignation from the Navy on June 6, 1865.

During the above period this officer rendered gallant and arduous service to his country, including active duty during the war of the rebellion. He died April 1, 1890, of malarial poisoning, which had its origin during his mid service, and his widow was allowed a pension at $25 per month under the general pension laws. This was increased to $30 by special act approved February 15, 1893.

Gen. N. M. CURTIS, a member of the House, states that he knows the claimant personally, and that she is of delicate constitution, without property or means of support aside from her said pension, and is dependent upon whatever employment she can secure of a nature suited to her bodily strength and lot in life.

General CURTIS further states that the bill is in all respects an exceptionally meritorious one, and that an increase of her pension is an absolute necessity to the claimant's comfortable support.

In view of the valuable service rendered by Mrs. Bacon's husband, and in the light of her dependence and necessities, your committee feel constrained to recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

ARCHIBALD HUNLEY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5589) granting a pension to Archibald Hunley.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll the name of Archibald Hunley, late a member of Company H, Thirtieth Regiment Illinois Volunteers, at the rate of $15 per month.

The amendment of the Committee on Invalid Pensions was read, as follows:

Strike out "sixteen" and insert "twelve"; so as to make the amount of the pension $12 per month.

Mr. ERDMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for the reading of the report in that case.

The report (by Mr. WOOD) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5589) granting a pension to Archibald Hunley, submit the following report:

The committee, having examined the evidence in support of this bill, find:

Archibald Hunley was tried by division court-martial January 25, 1863, on charge of disrespectful language and resistance to officer, was convicted and sentenced to be confined at hard labor in military prison during remainder of his term, and to be dishonorably discharged. The sentence was duly executed. The offense for which he was tried was very trivial, if, indeed, any offense whatever. A sergeant being in the act of putting a drunken soldier in a tent, and having the soldier down in the mud and water, Hunley said to the sergeant: "Let him up and don't hurt him. You ought not to treat Graves that way."

That was the whole offense. Hunley's captain seems to have had a spite against him. When sick the captain had him sent to hospital and directed that no descriptive roll be sent with him. On Hunley's return from hospital the said captain, then being major, had him marked "absent without leave" and prevented him from getting his pay on that account. On Hunley's obtaining a certificate from the hospital showing his presence there, the major refused to have rolls corrected and said to him: "You must lose your pay or stand court-martial." Two hours afterwards Hunley was arrested; the trial followed, with the above result.

The case of this soldier has been before the Forty-seventh, Fiftieth, and Fifty-first Congresses. Favorable reports were made in the Forty-seventh and Fiftieth Congresses, and the above facts were found. The Fifty-first Congress passed an act for this soldier's relief, which was approved March 3, 1891, and provides that "the said proceedings of said court-martial be no bar to application for and allowance of a pension to said Hunley in accordance with the provisions and limitations of the pension laws." This act also authorized the Treasury Department to audit and pay Hunley his back pay, bounty, and allowances, which has since been done. Prior to the passage of said act the Secretary of War removed the charges of "being absent without leave and desertion."

The Secretary of the Interior, through the Commissioner of Pensions, now refuses to place the claimant on the pension roll under act of June 27, 1890, holding that he has not an honorable discharge.

There is no question but that this claimant is entitled under that act to a pension, so far as disability from manual labor is concerned.

Your committee conclude that a great wrong and hardship has been done this soldier; that he has been a victim of oppression and injustice at the hands of his officers, which the Congress in good faith has endeavored to correct so far as it is able. The act of June 27, 1890, was in force when the act for the relief of this soldier became a law. It must be considered that the lawmaking power had in mind the condition of legislation in regard to pensions. If reasonable effect be given to every part of the act for this soldier's relief, there is now no bar to his receiving a pension, except the unwarrantable action of the Commissioner of Pensions in refusing to obey the law.

Your committee recommend that the bill be amended by striking out the word "sixteen," in sixth line, and inserting in lieu the word "twelve," and that the bill as amended pass.

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to. The bill as amended was laid aside with favorable recommendation.

JOHN W. HINES.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5712) granting an increase of pension to John W. Hines.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension roll the name of John W. Hines, late first lieutenant and adjutant of Fourth Tennessee Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension of $30 per month.

Mr. ERDMAN. Let us hear the report.

The report (by Mr. PICKLER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5712) granting increase of pension to John W. Hines, having carefully considered the same, respectfully report:

John W. Hines enlisted June 7, 1861, as private in Company C, First Kentucky Volunteer Infantry, and was discharged therefrom May 15, 1863. He reenlisted as first lieutenant in the Fourth Tennessee Volunteer Infantry January 2, 1864, and served to April 24, 1865, when he resigned.

February 24, 1891, he filed a claim under the old law alleging rheumatism contracted in the service. On August 21, 1892, the examining board finds him entitled to a first-grade rating for disability from said cause. He is pensioned under the act of June 27, 1890, at $12, for rheumatism and resulting disease of the heart.

Almost every officer of the Pension Office who passed upon this claim under the old law recommended its allowance, but the reviewer says:

"The claimant having declared that inflammatory rheumatism was contracted during his first service at Shiloh, Tenn., in April, 1862, and having made no other declaration under oath as to origin, it appears that the evidence of the existence of rheumatism during the service as first lieutenant and adjutant of the Fourth Tennessee Volunteer Infantry is not sufficient to warrant the allowance as of that origin and that rank."

And for this reason the claim was rejected.

As to origin, Lieutenant-Colonel Patterson, in command of the Fourth Tennessee, testifies:

"In January, 1865, my command was ordered on forced march from Knoxville, Tenn., to Paintrock, N. C. It rained on us nearly all the time and we were marching day and night, wading many small streams and creeks, also Big Pigeon River and the French Broad River. Much ice was floating on these rivers and we had to wade them, the water coming to our armpits, and we had, what little camping we did, to be on the frozen ground. From this exposure and hard marching Lieut. John W. Hines was again attacked with his old disease—diarrhea—and also with an attack of inflammatory rheumatism. The two disabilities together rendered him unfit for duty for a long time afterwards. I remember that a great many of the men were affected and unfit for duty for some time afterwards. I am one of them."

The then major, afterwards lieutenant-colonel, in command of the same regiment, says:

"John W. Hines . . . was with the regiment in all its marches and exposures when able for duty. . . . I have read Col. M. L. Patterson's statement made for Mr. Hines and indorse the same as fully as if here stated."

The testimony as to continuance is full and complete.

This case was several times specially examined, and on October 8, 1894, the examiner says:

"The claimant's general standing in the community and his reputation for truth are good. I find him a very much broken-down man—unable to dress himself. . . . The claim has merit."

December 15, 1894, another special examiner recommended the case for admission for rheumatism.

On April 23, 1894, the chief of the board of review says:

"The rheumatism appears to be established as of army origin, if not in Kentucky service."

The claim was rejected on a mere technicality.

Your committee think the claimant is entitled to at least $30 per month, whether he claims as private or first lieutenant, and therefore respectfully recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

JOHN COOMBS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 950) granting an increase of pension to John Coombs.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of John Coombs, of Hopkinsville, Ky., and pay him a pension at the rate of $50 per month, in lieu of the pension he now receives. John Coombs served in the Army of the United States during the late war in Company H, Second Illinois Light Artillery, and this increase of pension is asked on account of total disability resulting from injuries and diseases traced to his army service.

Mr. ERDMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for the reading of the report.

The report (by Mr. ANDERSON) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 950) granting increase of pension to John Coombs, late a member of Company H, Second Illinois Light Artillery, having carefully examined all the facts and circumstances in evidence, submit the following report:

Soldier served from December 1, 1861, until July 28, 1865. He filed claim and was pensioned, receiving $24 per month since April, 1889, for injury of back and left leg and varicose ulcers, disease of gums and loss of teeth, result of scurvy contracted in service. He filed claim for increase June 17, 1895, which was rejected.

Dr. J. M. Dennis and Dr. F. M. Stiles, both reputable citizens and excellent physicians, testify that claimant is wholly disabled for performing any kind of manual labor from the disabilities for which he is pensioned; and the board of examining surgeons at Hopkinsville, Ky., who examined him August 14, 1895, certified:

"Claimant is so disabled from disease of left leg and varicose ulcers and disease of gums and loss of teeth, as result of scurvy, as to be incapacitated for performing any manual labor."

In addition to his pensioned disabilities the soldier is now blind in one eye and almost blind in the other eye, and is practically helpless.

In view of all the facts we believe him entitled to a pension of $50 per month. We therefore recommend that the bill (H. R. 950) be amended by striking out all after the word "Coombs," in the sixth line, and inserting in lieu thereof the following words: "Late a member of Company H, Second Regiment Illinois Light Artillery, at the rate of $30 per month, in lieu of the pension he is now receiving."

Mr. ERDMAN. Mr. Chairman, I would like the gentleman in charge of this bill to make a somewhat more extended statement with reference to the bill than appears in the report, which is hardly satisfactory.

Mr. CLARDY. I will with pleasure. What particular point have you in view?

Mr. ERDMAN. This seems to be simply a charity, a gratuity on the part of the Government, and not a matter of right.

Mr. CLARDY. The gentleman is entirely mistaken; it lacks a great deal of being a matter of gratuity.

Now, let me say, in the first place, that this is not a ninety-day soldier, a bounty-jumper, or anything of that kind, but a soldier from the very beginning to the end of the war. That is the kind of a man we ask you to pension in this case. He served through the whole war.

His horse fell with him at Columbus and partially injured one of his legs, and although he went through the war in a somewhat disabled condition, it continued to grow worse and worse; varicose veins developed, and as you understand they continue to grow worse as a rule. Scurvy also was contracted, and the disease from that source grew worse. If there is any man who ever served in the Army of the United States who merits a pension this man is one, and he only asks to be pensioned at what the law allows him.

The physicians, reputable citizens and excellent physicians, who examined him testify that he is wholly disabled for any kind of manual labor; and the examining surgeons—the board at Hopkinsville, Ky.—in August, 1895, certified that he was so disabled from the disease of the left leg and from the results of the scurvy as to be incapacitated for any kind of manual labor.

Mr. Chairman, I know this man personally. He lives in my county town. And I am sure I would not recommend a pension to any soldier whom I did not believe was entitled to it. My friend Colonel EVANS here, who once lived in the county, also knows this man well, and knows he was a good, a faithful soldier.

Mr. MILES. What is the proposition in the bill?

Mr. CLARDY. To give him $30 a month.

Mr. ERDMAN. I am satisfied.

The question being taken on the amendment recommended by the committee, it was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

MARY E. HAZLIP.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 138) granting a pension to Mary E. Hazlip.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mary E. Hazlip, widow of John Hazlip, late a private in Company H, One hundred and fortieth New York Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month, in lieu of the pension she is now receiving.

Mr. ERDMAN. Mr. Chairman, let us have the report.

The report (by Mr. ANDREWS) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 138) granting an increase of pension to Mary E. Hazlip, having examined the same, respectfully report:

It appears that the soldier served in Company H, One hundred and fortieth Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry, from August 16, 1862, to June 3, 1865, when he was mustered out with his company, and that he has an honorable record.

He was pensioned under general law at $4 per month for gunshot wound of right shoulder, and also under act of 1890 at $12 per month, and that the latter pension was terminated February 6, 1891, by reason of the pensioner's death, which is believed to have resulted from the effects of a bullet or other missile lodged in the right shoulder during the war of the rebellion, although this was not conclusively proved to the satisfaction of the Pension Office.

Dr. M. D. Bedal was called in on consultation just before the soldier's death, and says in his affidavit that, from statements made to him by the attending physician, Dr. S. B. Taylor, and the family of the soldier, he believes that said "soldier died from the effects of a bullet or other missile lodged in the right shoulder during the war of the rebellion, and as that fact was not disputed, no post-mortem examination was had." Dr. S. B. Taylor is now dead, and therefore his affidavit can not be secured.

Your committee believe that the claim is a just one, and therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall this bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation?

Mr. ERDMAN. Will the gentleman who made this report state whether there is any other testimony in this case than the hearsay testimony of Dr. Bedal?

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. Chairman, the consulting physician here named states in his affidavit the agreement between himself and the attending physician. As the attending physician is dead, his affidavit can not be secured, and the committee believed the affidavit of the consulting physician, under these circumstances, was sufficient to justify the recommendation of the passage of the bill.

The financial condition of the widow and all the circumstances, aside from the points stated in the report, led the committee to strongly believe that the pension was just and reasonable, and that it should be allowed at $12 a month.

Mr. ERDMAN. Does the gentleman know from what disease this person died?

Mr. ANDREWS. I am not able to state the nature of the disease, but the affidavit of the consulting physician conveys definitely and positively the assurance that in the judgment of these two physicians his death resulted from this wound.

Mr. ERDMAN. Dr. Bedal had no knowledge at all on the subject, and Dr. Taylor only heard the statement of the soldier and his family.

Mr. ANDREWS. No; the physician who was in consultation with the attending physician states this as the result of their deliberations.

Mr. ERDMAN. That does not appear. He testifies in a very indefinite way.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MRS. ANNIS H. ENOCHS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4275) to increase the pension of Mrs. Annis H. Enoch, widow of Gen. William H. Enoch, from $20 to $50 per month.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the pension of Annis H. Enoch, widow of Gen. William H. Enoch, late lieutenant-colonel of the Fifth Regiment of West Virginia Volunteer Infantry and brevet brigadier general, United States Volunteers, be, and the same is hereby, increased from $20 per month to $50 per month, and the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place her name on the pension roll at the rate of $50 per month, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall this bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation?

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I ask for the reading of the report.

The report (by Mr. KERR) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4275) to increase the pension of Annis H. Enoch, widow of Bvt. Brig. Gen.

William H. Enoch, from $30 per month to $50 per month, submit the following report.

William H. Enoch was mustered into service as first lieutenant Company K, Fifth West Virginia Volunteers, to date September 15, 1861, to serve three years; as captain Company E, same regiment, to date April 19, 1862; as lieutenant-colonel, same regiment, to date September 29, 1863; as colonel, same regiment, to date December 23, 1864, and was mustered out and honorably discharged with the field and staff July 21, 1865.

Under the provision of the act of Congress approved June 3, 1864, and the acts amendatory thereof, he is considered by this Department as having been commissioned to the grade of colonel of the said regiment to date from December 19, 1864.

The medical records show that W. H. Enoch, lieutenant-colonel Fifth West Virginia Volunteers, was dangerously wounded, being shot through the body in action September 19, 1864.

He was brevetted brigadier-general of volunteers March 13, 1865, "for gallant and meritorious services."

After careful consideration of the merits of this bill, your committee are of opinion, in view of the brilliant military record of the late General Enoch, who served constantly in the field from September, 1861, until the close of the late war, that the allowance asked for the benefit of his widow is by no means extravagant, and they therefore recommend that the bill do pass.

The widow has no sufficient means of support. Appended is a report from the War Department, giving the military record of General Enoch:

Statement of the military service of William H. Enoch, brevet brigadier-general of volunteers.

William H. Enoch was mustered into service as first lieutenant Company K, Fifth West Virginia Volunteers, to date September 15, 1861, to serve three years; as captain Company E, same regiment, to date April 19, 1862; as lieutenant-colonel, same regiment, to date September 29, 1863; as colonel, same regiment, to date December 23, 1864, and was mustered out and honorably discharged with the field and staff July 21, 1865.

Under the provisions of the act of Congress approved June 3, 1864, and the acts amendatory thereof, he is considered by this Department as having been commissioned to the grade of colonel of the said regiment to date from December 19, 1864.

The medical records show that W. H. Enoch, lieutenant-colonel Fifth West Virginia Volunteers, was wounded in action September 19, 1864.

He was brevetted brigadier-general of volunteers March 13, 1865, "for gallant and meritorious services."

By authority of the Secretary of War:

F. C. AINSWORTH,

Colonel, United States Army, Chief Record and Pension Office.

RECORD AND PENSION OFFICE,
War Department, December 20, 1895.

Mr. FENTON. Mr. Chairman, just one word in reference to this bill. The military record of General Enoch is not quite complete, as stated in the report. I desire to use about a minute in the statement of it. General Enoch not only served from September, 1861, but he first enlisted in the three-months' service, on the 19th of April, 1861, served through that service, and then reenlisted. In October, 1861, he was elected captain of his company. Within a month afterwards he was chosen major of his regiment, but the colonel declined to commission him as a major on account of his youth, he being then only 19 years of age. When he was 29 years of age he was a colonel. At 23 he was a brigadier-general by brevet, and also in command of a department. His record was one of the very best and most brilliant. He was probably the youngest brigadier-general in the Army.

He was a member of this House in the Fifty-second Congress and reelected to the Fifty-third Congress. I doubt not there are many members present who knew him. I trust there will be no amendment offered to this bill.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, this is a case somewhat similar to that of Mrs. Mary L. Bacon, a little ahead of this case.

Mr. PICKLER. Will the gentleman from South Carolina yield to me to move that the committee rise?

Mr. TALBERT. Just let me offer an amendment, and let us pass this amendment, and pass this bill. Maybe we can get through with it. I move to amend by striking out "$50" and make it "$40," upon the same plane as Mrs. Bacon, the bill just passed, which was in charge of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CURTIS].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that this is a very contrary kind of a House. [Laughter.] I thought that was a very fair proposition. I can not see any difference between the merits of this case and the merits of the one that we passed giving Mrs. Bacon a pension of $40 a month. I see nothing in the testimony, I see nothing in the report of the committee which makes one single bit of difference between the deserts of these distinguished ladies, widows of these distinguished major-generals; and I can not see why it is that this House continually persists in this headlong way of extravagance in pensions of this kind.

Mr. PICKLER. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. TALBERT. I will yield for a question.

Mr. PICKLER. I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. TALBERT. I hope the gentleman will not take me off the floor and put me on the table or under the table until I get ready to go. I claim the right to address this House on an important question.

The CHAIRMAN. The hour has now arrived when the committee must rise.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. PAYNE having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. HEPBURN reported that the Committee of the Whole House had had under consideration the bill S. 730 and the bills H. R. 3937, H. R. 3075, H. R. 1299, H. R.

389, H. R. 5580, and H. R. 950, and had made certain amendments to them, and as amended recommended their passage; that it had also had under consideration the bills H. R. 1261, H. R. 4913, H. R. 5400, H. R. 5712, and H. R. 138, and recommended the passage of the same; that it had also had under consideration the bill H. R. 4275, and had come to no resolution thereon.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The hour of 10.30 having arrived, the House stands adjourned until to-morrow at 12 o'clock noon.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, in response to a resolution of the 16th ultimo, calling for the report submitted to the Commissioner of Patents on the tests and field work of the American cotton picker exhibited at the Cotton States and International Exposition lately held at Atlanta, Ga., transmitting a letter from the Commissioner of Patents, and accompanying unofficial report, made by a law clerk in his office, regarding the cotton-picking machine referred to; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. LODGE presented resolutions adopted by the legislature of the State of Massachusetts, relative to the establishment of a national military park at Vicksburg; which were read, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, as follows:

Commonwealth of Massachusetts. In the year 1896. Resolutions relative to the establishment of a national military park at Vicksburg.

Whereas there is now pending in Congress a bill (H. R. 4339) "to establish a national military park to commemorate the campaign, siege, and defense of Vicksburg," which has been favorably reported by the Committee on Military Affairs; and

Whereas Gettysburg and Vicksburg, being inseparably connected, and constituting the greatest epoch in the war of the rebellion, should be equally commemorated in the most impressive and enduring manner possible; and

Whereas the establishment of a national military park to commemorate the campaign and siege of Vicksburg will be a most appropriate monument to the commander whose genius planned these operations and directed them to a successful issue, and whose fame and character are so dear to all Americans; and

Whereas the State of Massachusetts has not only a general but also an special interest in this bill, for the reason that three of her gallant regiments of infantry volunteers, the Twenty-ninth, Thirty-fifth, and Thirty-sixth, participated in the operations it proposes to commemorate: Therefore

Resolved, That the senate and house of representatives of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, in general court assembled, request the Senators and Representatives from this Commonwealth in the Congress of the United States to use their influence to secure the prompt passage by Congress, at this session, of the bill H. R. 4339, and request the House Committee on Rules to give the earliest possible date for its consideration by the House.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions, properly attested, be transmitted by the clerks of the two branches of the general court to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

DELAYS IN WASHINGTON POST-OFFICE.

Mr. LODGE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Postmaster-General be directed to inform the Senate why there is so much delay in the transmission of public documents through the Washington post-office, and whether it is not possible to secure the prompt dispatch of such documents from Washington.

BRANDY FROM FRUITS AND ALCOHOL IN THE ARTS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to move to take up the bill (H. R. 886) to amend section 3255 of the Revised Statutes of the United States concerning the distilling of brandy from fruits; but I should like the attention of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON].

I regard it as of the highest importance that action should be taken on the bill at the present session. It is a matter involving very largely the revenue of the Government, running into millions of dollars. I wish to fix a time when it will be agreeable to the Senate to consider the bill, and when it will at least not interfere with the ordinary business. The Senator from Iowa appreciates with me the importance of this bill and the urgency of action upon it; but I do not wish to interfere with the appropriation bills if it can be understood by the Senate that the bill shall be taken up after the appropriation bills are disposed of.

Mr. PEPPER. It can not be so understood, Mr. President. I shall object to it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is interposed to the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then I move to proceed to the consideration of House bill 886.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I desire to make a suggestion, with the permission of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that the motion is not debatable.

Mr. CHANDLER. I understand, but before making the motion the Senator from Ohio made an inquiry, and I suppose that perhaps under the circumstances there will be no objection to my making a suggestion. I ask unanimous consent to make a suggestion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent to make a suggestion. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. CHANDLER. It was generally understood yesterday, and has been for two or three days, that no business calculated to take up time or encounter debate should be brought before the Senate until after the appropriation bills were disposed of. That has been the idea of the Senator from Iowa and of other Senators, I think, upon both sides of the Chamber. The Senator from Ohio must be aware that interjecting the tariff bill, a subject which it has been announced in the Senate is as dead as Julius Caesar, is indefinitely postponing the consideration of appropriation bills. I appeal to the Senator to withhold his motion until the appropriation bills are disposed of.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ought to say in reply that this measure does not bring up the tariff question to any considerable extent. It is true the House bill does make a single provision in regard to the distilling of brandy from fruits, to which there is no objection and which it is important to pass at this time in aid of the revenue. The tax on brandy made from fruits is still continued, and it increases the revenue. The amendment proposed by the Senate committee, and which is vitally important, is a repeal of section 61 of what is called the Wilson-Gorman Act. That section is pronounced by the Secretary of the Treasury and by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue as practically inoperative, and so report to Congress; and yet, while it is in existence, claims are being constantly made by persons who are manufacturing whisky used in the arts and for other purposes. Claims are accumulating to the amount of millions of dollars, and unless the section is repealed those claims will go on.

I do not believe there is any foundation in the claims, because I believe that section 61, which we ask to have repealed, does not take effect, and has not taken effect, because it depends upon regulations made by the Treasury Department, and the Treasury Department reports that no regulations whatever can protect the Government from palpable fraud.

That is the simple question involved in the case. All I desire is the repeal of section 61, the history of which is known to most Senators. It was made by inadvertence, merely to present the subject-matter to a committee of conference, and not with a view to letting it remain upon the statute books. But as we all know, the law was passed at the end without a committee of conference, simply from the necessity of the case, and everybody has felt the necessity of repealing section 61. It will involve the country in a very large expenditure and very large losses unless it is repealed. All I desire is to repeal it, leaving the claims, if any are outstanding, to be settled either by the courts or by the Department, or by subsequent legislation.

Mr. PEPPER. This bill will undoubtedly bring up a great deal of discussion, and I hope that the Senate will vote the motion down. It has been understood for a number of days past that the unfinished business—the bond resolution—should not be set aside for anything except—

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that debate is proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. PEPPER. I so understand, but I know the Senate will bear with me a moment, as it has borne with others, and I know the Chair will do so as long as Senators do not object. It has been understood for several days—certainly for five or six days—that nothing should interfere with the consideration of the bond resolution except appropriation bills, and I do hope the Senate will vote the motion down.

Mr. PLATT. I do not rise for the purpose of saying anything about this bill or whether it is advisable to repeal section 61, except to say that I feel it ought not to be repealed, and I shall be obliged to oppose its repeal.

The Senator from Ohio said if we could have some understanding that the bill should come up after the appropriation bills are out of the way he would not press it at this time. Of course he can move to take it up when the appropriation bills are out of the way and take the chances with all other measures for which Senators are seeking consideration.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, we can not hear the Senator from Connecticut on this side of the Chamber.

Mr. PLATT. I do not know whether I should repeat or not. The Senator from Ohio suggested that if there could be some understanding that this bill was to be considered after the appropriation bills were out of the way he would withhold his motion until that time.

Mr. SHERMAN. The pending appropriation bill.

Mr. PLATT. He corrects me now by saying "the pending appropriation bill." The Senator from Kansas says that he has unanimous consent, as I understand it, that his bond resolution shall be proceeded with except as it gives way to appropriation bills. There are other measures pending here in the way of special orders. So I suppose the Senator from Ohio would have to take his chances with the other matters that are pending before the Senate.

I simply desire to say, however, that this bill has not been long before the Senate, and it is a matter of such great importance to my constituents that I feel I shall be obliged to take considerable time in the discussion of it. I shall discuss it from two points of view. First, that the section ought not to be repealed without providing at the same time a substitute for it which should carry out the purpose of the law. The second point of view is that if it is insisted upon now that there should be a simple repeal of the section on the ground that it was a mistake, or that the Treasury is suffering, or likely to suffer, or possible to suffer from it, then I shall insist that if we are going to deal with the subject at all we should correct the great mistake of all and repeal the Wilson Act and reenact the McKinley Act.

Mr. GRAY. That would bring less revenue still.

Mr. PLATT. No, sir.

Mr. GRAY. That has been demonstrated. We will demonstrate it to you if you bring it up.

Mr. PLATT. I should like to discuss that proposition.

Mr. GRAY. We will discuss it if you bring it up. We are anxious to discuss it.

Mr. PLATT. I am anxious to discuss it.

Mr. GRAY. Not more than we are.

Mr. CHANDLER. I should like to ask the Senator from Connecticut whether he knows why it should be considered urgent here to repeal the provision as to whisky without putting a duty on wool?

Mr. PLATT. I simply desired to state that I should be obliged to discuss the subject at length.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President—

Mr. VEST. I object to further debate. Let us have a vote on the motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio to proceed to the consideration of House bill 886.

Mr. SHERMAN. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HILL (when his name was called). On this vote I am paired with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KYLE].

Mr. PERKINS (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. ROACH]. As he is not present, I will withhold my vote.

Mr. PUGH (when his name was called). I have a standing pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR]. I have no idea how he would vote on this motion. I therefore withhold my vote. I should vote "yea," if he were present.

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. THURSTON]. I do not think this is a matter that causes us to keep up pairs. I vote "nay."

Mr. WALTHALL (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON]. I transfer my pair to the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LINDSAY]. I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. PRITCHARD. I have a general pair with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD]. His colleague informs me that he considers this a political question, and therefore I will withhold my vote. If I were not paired, I should vote "nay."

Mr. LODGE. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. HOAR], if present, would vote "nay" on this question.

Mr. SHOUP. I have a general pair with the Senator from California [Mr. WHITE]. He seems to be absent from the Chamber, and I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. CARTER (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. GIBSON], who has not voted. I withdraw my vote.

Mr. ELKINS. I am paired with my colleague [Mr. FAULKNER], who is absent. I think if he were present, he would vote "yea," and therefore I can not vote. I should vote "nay," if I were not paired.

Mr. BLACKBURN (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. McMILLAN]. I note his absence from the Chamber. I will transfer my pair to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. IRBY] and let my vote stand.

Mr. BATE. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. HARRIS] is not well enough to be in the Chamber this morning, and he is paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. BACON. I inquire whether the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. WETMORE] has voted?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. He has not voted, the Chair is advised.

Mr. BACON. I desire to state that I have a general pair with that Senator, but under our arrangement each of us has a right, in his discretion, to vote on matters which are not political. Therefore I will vote in this instance. I vote "nay."

Mr. JONES of Arkansas (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], and not knowing how he would vote on this question, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. CARTER. I wish to announce the transfer of my pair with the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. GIBSON] to the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR]. I vote "nay."

Mr. PUGH. I vote "nay."

Mr. GEORGE. I wish to inquire whether the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McBRIDE] has voted?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. He has not voted, the Chair is advised.

Mr. GEORGE. I am paired with that Senator. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 24th instant approved and signed the following acts and joint resolution:

An act (S. 2141) to amend an act approved August 24, 1894, entitled "An act to authorize purchasers of the property and franchises of the Choctaw Coal and Railway Company to organize a corporation, and to confer upon the same all the powers, privileges, and franchises vested in that company";

An act (S. 69) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to settle the claims of the legal representatives of S. W. Marston, late United States Indian agent at Union Agency, Ind. T., for services and expenses;

An act (S. 1817) to grant certain lands to the city of Colorado Springs, Colo.;

An act (S. 744) providing for a naval training station on the island of Yerba Buena (or Goat Island), in the harbor of San Francisco, Cal., and for other purposes; and

A joint resolution (S. R. 181) relative to the improvement of the harbor of Erie, Pa.

BILL BECOME A LAW.

The message also announced that the bill (S. 136) granting an increase of pension to Horace Townsend, having been presented to the President of the United States on the 9th instant and not having been returned by him to the House of Congress in which it originated within the ten days prescribed by the Constitution, has become a law without his approval.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7634) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes.

Mr. PRITCHARD. I offer an amendment, to be inserted after line 6, on page 88.

The amendment was read, and agreed to, as follows:

For keeping in repair the Guilford battle grounds: To enable the Guilford Battle Ground Company to maintain and keep in proper repair the grounds and public buildings of said company, and other expenses, the sum of $1,000; said amount to be disbursed on the order of the president of the said company.

Mr. PEPPER. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Iowa to the last paragraph, on page 120 of the bill. It provides for repealing a portion of an act passed some time ago for the benefit of libraries in different parts of the country. I wish to ask the Senator whether there is a provision anywhere else in the bill or in any other bill passed at the present session that will supply the defect which will be caused by striking out these words.

Mr. ALLISON. I know of no other provision in the bill.

Mr. PEPPER. Then I move that the words on page 120, beginning with line 19 and continuing to the end of line 3, on page 121, be stricken out.

My reason for moving the amendment is because there is a very great demand coming up from the public libraries of the country, and more especially those which are being organized in the public schools, for the dissemination of public documents among them. My correspondence this spring has been larger than ever before on that line. I find that a number of young men who are going to take part in oratorical contests and in discussions in their schools and societies upon matters pending in the Congress of the United States and matters of public concern generally want information, and within the last sixty days I think I have had applications from at least twelve or fifteen private libraries, that is to say, libraries in institutions carried on by religious associations and by citizens in the towns, for the purpose of supplying themselves with this information which comes through public documents.

I hope the Senator from Iowa will not insist on retaining the provision in the bill, because it repeals the sections indicated. I will read the clause so as to call the attention of Senators to it:

That paragraph 46, section 73, of an act entitled "An act providing for the public printing and binding and the distribution of public documents," approved January 12, 1895, be, and the same hereby is, amended by striking out the following words: "Of which number eight copies shall be sent by the Superintendent of Documents, one each to such public or school libraries other than designated depositories as shall be designated for this purpose by each Representative and Delegate in Congress."

I think it would be better to enlarge the number, so that we might be able to supply all the demands. They are constantly growing, and I have conferred with some other Senators in relation to it and I find that it is the same with them.

Mr. GRAY. What reason is alleged for striking out those words?

Mr. PEPPER. I do not know.

Mr. ALLISON. It is economy; that is all. I shall interpose no objection to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 120, after line 18, it is proposed to strike out:

That paragraph 46, section 73, of an act entitled "An act providing for the public printing and binding and the distribution of public documents," approved January 12, 1895, be, and the same hereby is, amended by striking out the following words: "Of which number eight copies shall be sent by the Superintendent of Documents, one each to such public or school libraries other than designated depositories as shall be designated for this purpose by each Representative and Delegate in Congress."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PERKINS. I desire to offer an amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 20, after line 15, it is proposed to insert:

For constructing a steam revenue cutter of the first class, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, for service on the Pacific Coast, $250,000.

Mr. PERKINS. I will state that at the last session of Congress a bill was passed authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to construct a first-class revenue cutter for the Pacific Coast. Two hundred thousand dollars was appropriated for that purpose. Bids were invited from various shipbuilders, and the lowest bid received for a steam cutter suitable for that service, to ply in the north waters of the Pacific and in the Arctic Ocean, with sufficient capacity to carry coal for the voyage, was $290,000. The $200,000 still remains in the Treasury. At the present session of Congress a bill was introduced, and it has passed the Senate, Senate bill 1639, providing for the building of two revenue cutters. The bill, I am informed, has been favorably considered in the other House, but it will not become a law at this session.

The Secretary of the Treasury and the Chief of the Revenue Department are unanimous in requesting at least one cutter for the Pacific Coast. They say that there should be two. I think there can be no point of order made against the amendment, as the bill to which I have referred has already passed the Senate. I ask for only one revenue cutter, and I trust the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations will accept the amendment.

Mr. CHANDLER. I should like to ask the Senator from California a question. The Senator is very earnest and very diligent and very successful in procuring appropriations for his own coast. I desire to ask him about the provision on page 20, "for completing a revenue steamer of the first class, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, for service on the Pacific Coast, $125,000." Is that the same cutter for which the Senator now asks provision, or another one?

Mr. PERKINS. This is for another cutter. The bill to which I referred provides for two revenue cutters. The Senator from New Hampshire gave that bill his approval. The Committee on Commerce unanimously reported in favor of it. It has passed the Senate, as I before stated, and if this sum is appropriated for that purpose it will enable us to complete the other cutter and give us an additional one, which is so necessary for protecting the revenues of our country on the Pacific coast.

Mr. CHANDLER. I think there ought to be two, but I want to vote intelligently on the amendment of the Senator from California.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from California.

Mr. ALLISON. Let it be again stated.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will again be stated.

The SECRETARY. After line 15, on page 20, it is proposed to insert:

For constructing a steam revenue cutter of the first class, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, for service on the Pacific Coast, $250,000.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not think $250,000 is necessary. I hope the Senator from California will modify his amendment by inserting $200,000 instead, and then I shall not object to it.

Mr. PERKINS. Under other circumstances I would gladly do so, but it is much better for us in building a cutter to have one suitable to the business of the Pacific Coast. As the Senator from Iowa is aware, we have over 3,000 miles of coast line on the coasts of Oregon, California, and Alaska, and it is absolutely necessary that the vessel shall not only have sufficient capacity for carrying fuel, but that she shall have speed. As I have stated, $290,000 was the lowest bid received by the Secretary of the Treasury for a revenue cutter of a displacement of 1,000 tons, with a maximum speed of from 16 to 17 miles an hour and an average speed at sea of 12 miles, which is absolutely necessary. Frequently steamers break down, and the revenue cutters are called into service to rescue life and property. The Revenue-Cutter Service of this country has rendered most valuable service to the merchant trade in that respect. Therefore I think it is much better for us to have sufficient money appropriated to build a suitable vessel. Of course, if the Senator from Iowa insists upon it, I will accept $200,000, but it will not give us such a vessel as we ought to have for the trade.

Mr. FRYE. The report from the Department is that on the Pacific coast such a vessel can not be built for less than $350,000, and the Senate Committee on Commerce unanimously reported a bill for that purpose, and it passed the Senate at that sum.

Mr. GRAY. Such a vessel could be built on this coast for a less sum.

Mr. FRYE. Undoubtedly.

Mr. ALLISON. It depends upon the kind of steamer that is built. I understand very well that such a revenue cutter as the Senator from California proposes would cost $250,000 and probably more. But we have appropriated $175,000 for cutters on the Atlantic coast. If the Senators think it will advance the building of the vessel better by leaving it at $250,000 I shall not object.

Mr. CHANDLER. I am entirely certain that it is necessary to have much larger vessels on the Pacific coast than on the Atlantic coast.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator from Iowa does not object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FRYE. On page 16, line 3, after the word "Superior," I move to insert:

Gas buoys at or near the following-named places in the St. Lawrence River: One at Charity Shoals, one at Featherbed Shoals, one at Rock Island Point, one near the Sisters Island light, one at Sunken Rock, one at Bay State Shoals, one at the Lower Narrows, and one at entrance upper harbor, Ogdensburg.

This is an experiment, as to the success of which there is not much doubt. It will save a good many thousand dollars in the matter of light-houses, and it is recommended strongly by the Light-House Board, reported unanimously by the Committee on Commerce, and has passed the Senate in another shape. The cost is very small, not over $4,000.

Mr. ALLISON. I submit to the Senator from Maine that he will not accomplish his object unless he puts a sum in the amendment. I believe the amount estimated for this purpose is $4,000.

Mr. FRYE. The amendment is to be inserted in the provision where $900,000 is proposed to be appropriated for this sort of thing.

Mr. ALLISON. It is in connection with that provision?

Mr. FRYE. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALLISON. Let the Secretary read the connection.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as indicated.

Mr. FRYE. There is no need of reading it. It says:

Lighting of rivers: For establishing, supplying, and maintaining post lights—

And then about 40 places are named.

Mr. ALLISON. I object to inserting it at that point. I prefer that the Senator should put the amendment in as a separate provision and make an appropriation for it. The appropriation for lighting rivers is now rather less than it ought to be, and I hope the Senator will not burden it with these lights. The Light-House Board stated that if this appropriation—

Mr. FRYE. If the Senator objects to the amendment going in at that point, I will not offer it there and I will not offer it at the present moment, because I shall be obliged to ascertain the exact cost.

Mr. ALLISON. I will say to the Senator that we considered the matter in the Committee on Appropriations very thoroughly, and the Light-House Board stated that if we would add to the appropriation at another place for lighted buoys, they would put up these lights without any additional appropriation. But I have learned since that time that it may be necessary to have a specification of those places in order to insure their being lighted. Therefore if the Senator puts in $4,000 for this purpose I shall not object.

Mr. FRYE. I will amend it, then, by inserting the words "to establish" gas buoys so and so, "$4,000," and offer it as an item to be inserted immediately after the conclusion of the paragraph where I did offer it.

Mr. ALLISON. I will state to the Senator that the Light-House Board said that if we would increase the appropriation they would put in these lights, but I have learned since that it is possible that this sum might be exhausted, or that it is doubtful, at least, whether it could be done unless a special appropriation be made.

Mr. FRYE. I propose to offer it now as a special appropriation.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well.

Mr. FRYE. Then there is no objection to it?

Mr. ALLISON. It ought to come in on page 15, after line 7.

The SECRETARY. On page 15, after line 7, it is proposed to insert:

To establish gas buoys at or near the following-named places in the St. Lawrence River: One at Charity Shoals, one at Featherbed Shoals, one at Rock Island Point, one near the Sisters Island Light, one at Sunken Rock, one at Bay State Shoals, one at the Lower Narrows, and one at entrance upper harbor, Ogdensburg, $4,000.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Maine.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FRYE. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Iowa to an item on page 20. The committee inserted a provision for constructing one revenue cutter for service on the Lakes. Two revenue cutters are absolutely necessary on the Lakes, and they ought to be first-class cutters, swift, and very strong. The Senator knows why they ought to be without my stating the reason, and the Senate does. The Committee on Commerce, on the recommendation of the Treasury Department, reported unanimously in favor of two vessels, to cost $200,000 each. A bill for that purpose passed the Senate without any opposition. I should like, in line 13, after the word "constructing," to strike out "a" and insert the word "two," making "steamer" into the plural "steamers," and striking out "two," in line 15, and making it "four."

Mr. ALLISON. The Committee on Appropriations considered this provision very carefully. We are now building, as the Senator is aware, a revenue cutter for service on the Lakes, and the committee were of opinion that if we could get one additional cutter it would perhaps be all that we would be likely to secure this year.

I quite agree with the Senator from Maine that if we could provide for two vessels it would be well to do so. But I hope the Senator will not insist upon another revenue cutter.

Mr. FRYE. I should like to have the amendment put in here. I think we are infinitely more likely to get one cutter if we provide for two in the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. I am not so sure of that. I shall not object to the Senator's amendment, however.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In the amendment of the committee, beginning in line 13, page 20, it is proposed to strike out the word "a" and insert "two"; to strike out the word "steamer" and insert "steamers"; and, in line 15, to strike out the word "two" and insert "four"; so as to read:

For constructing two revenue steamers of the first class, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, for service on the Great Lakes, $400,000.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. By unanimous consent, the vote by which the amendment was agreed to will be considered as reconsidered. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I offer an amendment, to be inserted on page 55, at the end of line 19.

The amendment was read and agreed to, as follows:

To collect statistics in relation to criminals and paupers, the feeble-minded, deaf, dumb, and blind, and to investigate the causes of criminality and pauperism from a scientific point of view, and purchase and repair of instruments of precision under the direction of the Bureau of Education, $1,000.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I offer an amendment, to be inserted on page 3, after line 16.

The amendment was read and agreed to, as follows:

For constructing a bathroom and lavatory in the basement of the post-office building at Sioux Falls, S. Dak., $300.

Mr. BATE. On behalf of my colleague [Mr. HARRIS], who is unable to be in the Chamber to-day, I offer an amendment, to be inserted after the word "dollars," in line 10, on page 112. The amendment embraces claims, permit me to say, which have been passed upon by the Court of Claims. All the items have been acted upon by the Court of Claims. The amendment has been reported unanimously from the Committee on Claims.

The SECRETARY. On page 112, line 10, after the word "dollars," it is proposed to insert:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the several persons in this act named, the several sums mentioned herein, the same being in full for, and the receipt of the same to be taken and accepted in each case as a full and final discharge of, the several claims examined, investigated, and reported favorably by the Court of Claims of the United States under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1883, entitled "An act to afford assistance and relief to Congress and the Executive Departments in the investigation of claims and demands against the Government," and known as the Bowman Act, namely—

Mr. ALLISON. This is a very long amendment. I make the point of order against the amendment that it is not in order on the pending bill. It is not for service in the fiscal year ending in 1897. It is a collection of claims, which are not in order upon an appropriation bill. I hope the Senator from Tennessee will not press the amendment, as it is clearly out of order. I have the amendment before me, and I have also before me the reports relating to the claims. They have always been considered in this body in separate bills; they have never appeared on any of the regular appropriation bills. They are not audited accounts; they are not estimated for; they are not judgments, and in no sense can they be considered as applicable to a bill of this character.

Mr. HAWLEY. What claims are they?

Mr. ALLISON. They are individual claims referred to the Court of Claims under the Bowman Act.

Mr. BATE. I would rather that the amendment should not be disposed of just now. My colleague [Mr. HARRIS], in whose behalf, as I stated, I offered the amendment, is not here, and I know but little about the matter. The point of order is made upon the amendment. I think my colleague will be here by Monday, and if we do not dispose of the bill to-day I have no doubt he would like to be heard upon it. I suggest to the Senator from Iowa, the chairman of the committee, that the matter had better go over for the present.

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. BATE. I am not here to say that the Senator from Iowa is not correct in his point of order. It is something I should like to look into. These are just claims. It has been so decided by the Court of Claims. The claims have been taken up item by item. There are reports to show it. The Government owes the money. It is not disputed. The committee sent the amendment here by unanimous report, and I do not see why we can not dispose of it. But it may be amenable to the point of order which the Senator makes. I am not prepared to say that it is not. Therefore I think it is proper for us to delay it until my colleague comes in.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment will go over for the present.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not object to the Senator withdrawing the amendment or allowing it to lie upon the table; but, of course, it must be disposed of during the day, for I expect to finish the bill to-day.

Mr. BATE. If the bill is to be finished, of course the amendment will have to be disposed of; but if it is not finished I understand the amendment will not be disposed of.

Mr. GORDON. I offer an amendment, to appear on the third page of the bill, after line 9.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment, submitted by the Senator from Georgia will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After line 9, on page 3, it is proposed to insert:

That the act of Congress approved June 30, 1886, as amended by act of Congress approved January 21, 1891, providing for the purchase of a site and the erection thereon of a public building for the accommodation of the United States circuit and district courts, the post-office, and other Government uses, in the city of Savannah and State of Georgia, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to extend the limit of cost of the site and building, including fireproof vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, elevators, and approaches, complete, from $400,000 to $600,000, to permit the construction of said building of marble, and the Secretary of the Treasury may authorize a contract or contracts to be entered into for construction of any portion or the whole of said building within the limit of cost prescribed by law for said building, and subject to appropriations heretofore made and to be made therefor by Congress.

Mr. ALLISON. I offer as a substitute for the amendment what I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The substitute proposed by the Senator from Iowa will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, after line 15, it is proposed to insert:

For court-house at Savannah, Ga.: For continuation of building, $25,000; and the limit of cost of said building is increased $100,000.

Mr. GORDON. May I inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations the effect of that amendment? Is it intended as a substitute for the amendment I have just offered?

Mr. ALLISON. I hope the Senator from Georgia will withdraw his amendment. The Treasury Department recommend an increase of the limit $100,000 at Savannah, Ga. This amendment provides for that increase, and also gives a small appropriation of $25,000, which is substantially, I think, what the Senator desires.

Mr. GORDON. I should have no objection whatever to the substitute, provided it would accomplish the purposes in view, which are to give a marble front to a building in the city of Savannah, which ought to have it, instead of an ordinary brick front. The amendment is recommended by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the House of Representatives, and recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. ALLISON. The amendment I have offered to the amendment covers that idea by increasing the limit $100,000.

Mr. GORDON. That is satisfactory.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Georgia.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] to what I am going to say. I did not understand exactly the point of order which was made by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] against the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BATE] for his colleague [Mr. HARRIS]. I have an interest in that question, and I should like to understand what is his objection to that amendment, what rule of the Senate is violated by its being offered, especially when the amendment proposes simply to pay a debt which has been adjudicated by the Court of Claims, and the payment of which is recommended by the Committee on Claims of this body.

Mr. ALLISON. Is it the desire of the Senator that the point of order upon the amendment shall be now decided?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes; because it is a matter of very great importance to some very good people.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from Mississippi perhaps did not observe that the Senator from Tennessee asked that the amendment be laid aside for the present.

Mr. GEORGE. But the Senator from Michigan and I have amendments of a similar character which we intend to offer, and that is the reason why I am now interposing. I should like to know the specific point on which the Senator from Iowa believes the amendment out of order.

Mr. ALLISON. My point is that it is not estimated for. These claims have not passed through the accounting officers of the Treasury; they are not a judgment against the United States; they are simply the separate findings of the Court of Claims under the Bowman Act. We never have yet, so far as I know, put upon a regular appropriation bill any of the claims decided or considered by the Court of Claims under the Bowman Act. If we begin that business on appropriation bills there will be no end either to the amount of money appropriated or the time consumed in their consideration.

Mr. BURROWS. I only desire to state what the Senator from Mississippi has already indicated, that there is a claim of the same character of those embraced in the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee, which I have stated to the Senator from Mississippi I wished to offer as an amendment and intended to offer as an amendment, provided the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] was offered to the bill and admitted. If, however, the point of order is made against it, of course I shall not offer the amendment. As the point of order is the only question now before the Senate, I have nothing to say in relation to the merits of the amendment until that shall be determined; but I am frank to say that I do not see how the point of order can be avoided under clause 4 of Rule XVI, which provides that—

No amendment the object of which is to provide for a private claim shall be received to any general appropriation bill.

These are claims in favor of 325 individual citizens claiming $572,790.54, findings of the Court of Claims. As I said, however, I have nothing to say about the merit of the claims themselves until the point of order is decided.

Mr. HAWLEY. I move an amendment, on page 3, after line 3, concerning the post-office at Fortress Monroe.

Mr. ALLISON. I understand that the amendment relating to claims is now before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understood the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BATE] to request that the matter be not determined at this time.

Mr. BATE. Certainly, Mr. President, but as other persons were interested in it, I did not want to interfere with their desires. I made my request in courtesy to my colleague, and I think that the amendment ought to lie over until he returns.

Mr. ALLISON. But the Senator from Mississippi insists that this matter should be disposed of.

Mr. GEORGE. No; I do not.

Mr. BATE. That is a matter which I can not control, because the Senator has that right.

Mr. ALLISON. I have no objection to the amendment being laid aside temporarily.

Mr. GEORGE. I desire to say as to the amendment that I do not insist upon its consideration now. My object was simply to have from the Senator a more clear and explicit statement of the point on which he relied in making the point of order. That was all.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] submits an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, after line 3, it is proposed to insert:

For post-office at Fortress Monroe, Va.: That the sum of $15,000 be, and the same is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the erection of a post-office building at Fortress Monroe, Va., upon the Government reservation. The said building shall be erected upon plans, specifications, and contracts to be approved, in the manner provided by law, by the Secretary of War, and to cover quarters for the postmaster and office accommodations for customs officer and United States commissioner. Nor shall any plan for the erection of said building be approved by the Secretary of War involving an expenditure exceeding the said sum of $15,000.

Mr. HAWLEY. This is an amendment reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VEST. I am instructed by the Committee on Public

Buildings and Grounds to report an amendment, to come in at the foot of page 4.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the bottom of page 4 it is proposed to insert.

That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to submit to Congress a plan giving the size and general characteristics of a public building to be used for a hall of records in the city of Washington, suitable for the storage of papers, documents, and other records which have accumulated in the various Departments and are needed only for occasional use and also for the storage and distribution of books and other publications issued by the order of Congress; and said Secretary is directed, before making his report, to consult with the heads of the other Departments and the proper officers of the Senate and House of Representatives; and he is also directed to consider and report upon the suitability of a site for such a building on the public reservation at the intersection of Ohio and Louisiana avenues with Tenth and Twelfth streets, and of any other public grounds located within the city of Washington within reasonable distance of the Departments to be accommodated by such hall of records.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Missouri.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VEST. I call the attention of the chairman of the committee to lines 14, 15, and 16, on page 3 of the bill, for which I propose as a substitute the amendment I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out lines 14, 15, and 16, on page 3, and insert:

For post-office and court-house at Kansas City, Mo.: For continuation of building, $50,000, and the limit of cost of said building and site is increased from $1,300,000 to $1,516,000.

Mr. VEST. That only increases the limit $114,000, which was the amount fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not object to that amendment, but I call the attention of the Senator to the fact that the Senate amended the appropriation contained in the bill so as to make the sum $100,000 instead of $50,000, the Supervising Architect of the Treasury saying to us that if he had this additional $100,000 it would not be necessary to deal with the question of limit at this time. If the Senator prefers to deal with that question now I see no objection to his amendment.

Mr. VEST. I would rather do that, because the building can not go on unless the limit is increased, and this would be the end of the matter.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well. I shall not object to the substitution.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TURPIE. On page 62, after line 15, I move to insert the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 62, after line 15, it is proposed to insert:

Indianapolis Arsenal, Indianapolis, Ind.: For the payment to A. Bruner the sum of $4,223.15 for the construction of a main sewer in Clifford avenue, adjacent to the United States arsenal grounds, in the city of Indianapolis, Ind.: Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall not issue a warrant for the payment of said sum until the officer in command of the arsenal at Indianapolis shall certify that the sewer now provided for upon said grounds shall have been constructed by the United States and the same connected with the sewerage system of the city of Indianapolis.

Mr. ALLISON. The Committee on Appropriations considered this claim, if it can be called a claim, to reimburse Mr. Bruner for work he did on grounds of the United States, and we decided that it properly belonged to the general deficiency appropriation bill, and therefore left it off this bill. I trust the Senator will allow the amendment to lie over, to be placed on the general deficiency bill. I think that is the proper place for it.

Mr. TURPIE. It was on the sundry civil bill of last year, Mr. President.

Mr. ALLISON. I am aware of that. The Senate inserted this provision last year, but the House of Representatives did not agree to it.

Mr. TURPIE. This amendment has heretofore been offered and placed on the sundry civil bill. It passed the House at the last session, but was stricken out by the committee here on the ground that the connection of the local sewer had not been made to the general sewer in the street, for which this claim is made. Now the amendment is offered with a provision that that connection shall be made, and that the sum named shall then be payable. It is about four years since the work was done. The claim has been before the Committee on Claims two or three times, and this is the third session in which it has been presented. The claim is perfectly just and fair. The sewer runs along the street which is the boundary of the arsenal grounds.

Mr. ALLISON. The amendment is to pay for work already done, and not for work to be done, and therefore it belongs to the deficiency bill, and it is probable that when we get into conference that may be claimed. I therefore ask the Senator if he will not be willing to allow the amendment to be placed upon the general deficiency bill, which I am sure will be done?

Mr. TURPIE. With that assurance, Mr. President, I will withdraw the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. PERKINS. I desire to offer an amendment, on page 1, line 11, after the word "dollars," by inserting "to be immediately available."

This is an appropriation for repairing the wharf at Sitka, Alaska. The wharf is now in a very dilapidated condition, and the work should be done immediately. I received a communication from the collector of that port some few weeks since, in which he said if the appropriation was not made available immediately the season would be gone and the wharf perhaps washed away. I trust the amendment will be accepted.

Mr. ALLISON. I have no objection to it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "dollars," in line 11, page 1, it is proposed to insert "to be immediately available"; so as to read:

Government wharf in Alaska: For reconstructing or repairing and putting in safe and proper condition the wharf at Sitka, Alaska, $5,000, to be immediately available.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HILL. I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 5, at the end of line 12, it is proposed to insert:

For making certain proposed alterations in the post-office building in New York City, and for improving, arranging, and furnishing certain rooms therein, in accordance with plans proposed by the Supervising Architect of the Treasury, to be done under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, the sum of $40,000; such sum to be immediately available.

Mr. ALLISON. That amendment certainly was not called to the attention of the Committee on Appropriations, and I should be very glad to have the Senator from New York state the reasons for it. I have no knowledge of such an appropriation being estimated for.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, a bill to the same effect was reported favorably by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and has passed the Senate. If the amendment was not referred to the Committee on Appropriations it was an inadvertence on my part. I suppose, the bill having once passed the Senate, that is a compliance with the rules.

Just a word as to the importance of this work, which arises from the fact that there is in the city of New York a corporation known as the American Law Institute, which has its library in the post-office building. It formerly had its library in the Chambers street public building, and has always accompanied the United States court. It is one of the most valuable law libraries in this country. The accommodations for that library have become totally insufficient, and the corporation will have to remove the library to some other place unless greater accommodations can be furnished.

The Supervising Architect has made an estimate of the amount necessary to make certain alterations. The stories are very high, especially the ones where the court rooms are. The court rooms can be reduced just one-half, and another story put in. By putting iron beams across the rooms they can be duplicated. It can be done for the sum named in the amendment, and it must be done immediately, or the association will have to remove its library. The president of the association is Mr. Choate, and the best lawyers of New York are interested in it. The amendment is recommended by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads; it is also recommended by the Supervising Architect and by the judges of the United States court in the city of New York.

A bill having the same object in view has passed the Senate and can not pass the House of Representatives for various reasons well known to this body, and this amendment ought to go on this bill. That is the reason why I ask for its adoption.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from New York.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HILL. I have another amendment, to come in on page 20, at the end of line 15, which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 20, after the amendment already adopted, at the end of line 15, it is proposed to insert:

For constructing and equipping a steam revenue cutter of the first class for service on the Atlantic Coast of the United States, with headquarters at the port of New York, the sum of $250,000.

Mr. HILL. I offer the amendment to this bill at the suggestion of the chairman of the Committee on Commerce. A bill to the same effect has already been reported favorably, which has passed the other House, and it is suggested that it should go upon this bill as an amendment. I therefore offer it.

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly on the Atlantic Coast a revenue cutter can be constructed for $200,000. I know of no appropriation hitherto for the construction of a revenue cutter on the Atlantic Coast at a higher cost than $200,000, and I hope that the Senator will so modify his amendment.

Mr. HILL. I know nothing in regard to what the cost should be, except that the committee have reported the provision in that way.

Mr. ALLISON. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the word "fifty," before the word "thousand"; so as to make the appropriation $200,000.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa to the amendment of the Senator from New York.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. HILL. I offer another amendment, to come in at some proper place in the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert:

To Elihu Root, ex-United States attorney, southern district of New York, for services rendered as attorney for defendant in the suit of the Yale Lock Manufacturing Company against Thomas L. James, in March, 1884, by the direction of the Attorney-General, the sum of $2,000.

Mr. ALLISON. That is a deficiency. I trust the Senator will not move to put it upon this bill.

Mr. HILL. Are there no claims of that character in this bill?

Mr. ALLISON. Not usually.

Mr. HILL. A bill for this purpose has passed the Senate three or four times, but has always failed to pass the other House, and has never been finally acted upon.

Mr. ALLISON. I have no doubt it is a just claim, but it belongs to the general deficiency bill. I hope the Senator will not press it on this bill.

Mr. HILL. I will withdraw the amendment for the present, and will offer it on the deficiency bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. GRAY. On page 33, after line 16, I move the amendment I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 33, after line 16, it is proposed to insert:

For an additional fireproof building for the use of the National Museum, 200 feet square, with two stories and a basement, to be erected under the direction of Bernard B. Green, with the approval of the Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, in harmony with the present National Museum building, on the southwestern portion of the grounds of the Smithsonian Institution, there shall be appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $250,000; said building to be placed west of the Smithsonian Institution, leaving a roadway between it and the latter of not less than 50 feet, with its north front on a line with the south face of the Agricultural Department and of the Smithsonian Institution, and constructed as far as practicable, after proper advertisement, by contract or contracts approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, and awarded to the lowest responsible bidder; and all expenditures for the purpose herein mentioned shall be audited by the proper officers of the Treasury Department.

Mr. GRAY. I hope it may consist with the duty of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to accept this amendment. I will say that I offer it in place of the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL], who is absent, and who requested that I should urge the passage of the amendment upon the committee and upon the Senate.

Mr. PLATT. Is it the amendment in favor of which the Senator from Vermont made a speech recently?

Mr. GRAY. Yes, sir.

The Senator from Vermont is one of the Regents of the Smithsonian Institution. I also have the honor to be one of that body, and I know something in that way of the necessities for the building provided for in this amendment. There is a large amount of exceedingly valuable scientific material which is housed there in temporary wooden sheds, exposed to the peril of conflagration, and which would entail, if it were destroyed, incalculable loss not only upon the Government of the United States, but upon the scientific world. There are matters there now thus insecurely housed that could not be replaced. We all know what a credit the Smithsonian Institution is to the country and to the science of the country. There is no Department of the Government that is better conducted, more conscientiously administered in all of its branches, and from which there are so many benefits, direct and indirect, diffusing themselves among all the people of the country.

The Senator from Iowa, the chairman of the committee, of course understands this question better than I do. He is familiar with it. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] has the amendment very much on his mind and is exceedingly interested in its passage. He requested that I should make this statement for him as well as for myself to the Senate. I trust that the Senator from Iowa may see his way clear to accept the amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. The Committee on Appropriations considered the amendment very carefully and recognize the importance at an early day of an additional building for the National Museum, but in view of what appeared to be an apparent necessity for a large increase of the bill as it came to us from the House, we thought this matter might be postponed for another year. I am perfectly willing to leave it to the judgment of the Senate. I think the amendment is in order, and I do not make a point of order upon it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PASCO. On page 87, after line 14, I move to insert:

Military cemetery at Key West, Fla.: For the purchase and use of land included in the military cemetery adjacent to the reservation of Key West Barracks, Fla., as recommended in a letter from the Secretary of War, dated February 7, 1896 (House Document No. 221, Fifty-fourth Congress, first session), $2,000.

This purchase is recommended by the Secretary of War. The reasons for the recommendation are given in House Document No. 221, containing a letter from him, and accompanying documents. The amendment has been submitted to the Committee on Appropriations and the special attention of the chairman of the committee has been called to it.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not object to the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Florida [Mr. PASCO].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I offer an amendment, to come in after line 16, on page 106. I will state that the amendment was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and reported favorably from that committee. I will also state that a bill of a similar character was reported favorably by the Committee on the Judiciary and is on the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. After line 16, page 106, insert:

That any State having a claim or claims against the United States, including the claims of the States of California, Oregon, and Nevada, heretofore examined and reported by the Secretary of War to the Senate in Senate Executive Documents Nos. 10, 11, and 17, Fifty-first Congress, first session, under an act entitled "An act to indemnify the United States for expenses incurred by them in defense of the United States," approved July 27, 1861, is hereby given the right within one year from the passage of this act to file a petition in the Court of Claims of the United States and have the same adjudicated and determined. Said Court of Claims shall, notwithstanding the statute of limitations, hear, determine, and give judgment upon all such claims according to law.

Mr. ALLISON. I make the point of order upon the amendment that it is legislation.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I hope the chairman of the committee will not insist upon that point of order. It makes no appropriation. It does not increase the bill in any manner. It simply puts the claims in a shape to be adjudicated in the Court of Claims. There are a number of States interested in it. It is not merely my own State, but perhaps some eight or ten States of the Union have claims of this character. The Judiciary Committee were united in recommending the amendment to the appropriation bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is compelled to sustain the point of order against the proposed amendment.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I offer another amendment. On page 58, line 5, before the word "thousand," I move to strike out "two" and insert "ten"; so as to read:

Reproducing plats of surveys: To enable the Commissioner of the General Land Office to continue to reproduce worn and defaced official plats of surveys on file and other plats constituting a part of the records of said office, and to furnish local land offices with the same, $10,000.

If the chairman will allow me a moment, I will state that it is the purpose of the amendment to provide $10,000 instead of $2,000 for reproducing defaced official plats of surveys on file and other plats constituting a part of the records of the General Land Office. There are about 76,000 township maps; and they are all important in the transaction of the public business in the Land Office. The public-land States are immensely interested, of course, in the speedy and proper transaction of business relating to public lands.

The officer in charge of the Bureau submitted a letter recently recommending this increase in the appropriation and giving reasons why this work should be provided for. His recommendation is approved and earnestly recommended by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and also by the Secretary of the Interior, letters from each of whom I hold in my hand, and I will ask to have them at least incorporated in the RECORD, or read now if desired. The chief of the division states that of the 76,000 maps now in the office there are 5,000 of them requiring immediate attention, which are unfit for use, and nearly one-half of the whole number should have attention at a very early date; otherwise they can not go out into the hands of the subordinates of the office for the purpose of transacting the public business in that office. I ask that the communications be read.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope the communications will be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Very well.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, they will be printed in the RECORD without reading.

The communications are as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, Washington, April 22, 1896.

SIR: I have the honor to send you herewith a communication from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, inclosing a letter from the principal draftsman of his office, setting forth the necessity for the increase of the appropriation from $2,000 to $10,000 (the amount originally estimated) to reproduce worn and defaced township plats, and to request your favorable consideration of the same.

Respectfully,

HOKE SMITH, Secretary.

Hon. WILLIAM B. ALLISON,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations, United States Senate.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., April 23, 1896.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith a communication from Prof. Harry King, the principal draftsman of this office, dated the 23d instant, in which the necessity for the passage of an appropriation of $10,000 originally requested by this office for reproducing worn and defaced township plats is set forth.

It is believed that the needs for this appropriation, instead of the $2,000 recommended by the Committee on Appropriation in the sundry civil bill of the Senate and the House of Representatives, Fifty-fourth Congress, are imperative, and I therefore approve the suggestions contained in the accompanying letter.

Very respectfully,
The SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

S. W. LAMOREUX, Commissioner.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., April 23, 1896.

SIR: I beg to state that in the report of the Senate Committee on Appropriations, No. 728, making appropriations for sundry civil expenses, and which was reported with amendments to the Senate April 20, 1896, I find that the sum of $12,000 is allotted for engraving on copper the map of the United States, and but $2,000 for reproducing the worn and defaced township plats, whereas this office had made a request for $10,000 for this latter item.

Of the above two appropriations asked for the one for the preservation of the township plats is vastly of the greater importance, for reasons herein-after stated. Should it be found impracticable to obtain appropriation for both objects, I earnestly recommend that the item of $12,000 for the engraving on copper of the United States map (see page 53, lines 20, 21, and 22) be stricken out and in lieu thereof the appropriation for reproducing the township plats (see page 53, line 5) be raised to $10,000.

Of the 75,000 township plats now on file in this division, at least 5,000 require immediate reproduction by photolithography, barely one-half of which are so worn and defaced from constant handling as to cause them to be almost unintelligible, and unless measures are adopted for their early reproduction their withdrawal from inspection of even the employees of this office will soon be absolutely necessary, a result that, in so far as applies to those plats, will cause the stoppage, to a large extent, of the adjudication of matters pertaining to the disposal of public lands.

The reproduction of a township plat by photolithography, including an edition of 15 copies, will cost on an average of $6 per plat. The importance of applying at least $10,000 for their reproduction therefore becomes apparent.

All expenses incurred in reproducing these plats would eventually be returned to the United States Treasury through the sale of copies to outside parties at a cost of 25 cents each if uncertified or 50 cents each if certified.

This enlarged appropriation will not require an increased force of this division, as the work is given out by contract.

If the above recommendations should be carried out, it is my fixed opinion that they will insure to the best interest of the service.

Very respectfully,

HARRY KING,
Chief of the Drafting Division.

The honorable COMMISSIONER
UNITED STATES GENERAL LAND OFFICE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CALL. On page 30, after line 15, I move to insert:

For the construction of a revenue cutter for service on the Gulf of Mexico, $150,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

I will state that a bill for this purpose has passed the Senate, and that it is recommended by the Department.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ROACH. I offer an amendment which I send to the desk. I call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 51, after line 9, insert:

For beginning the construction of permanent buildings, providing for sewerage, water supply, roads and other means of communication, and other necessary improvements at the military post at Bismarck, N. Dak., to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, $50,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. I move to insert under the head of "Military posts," immediately after the amendment just adopted:

For continuation of construction of buildings at Fort Riley Military Post, Kans., to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, $50,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. On page 4, after line 15, I move to insert:

For court-house and post-office at Salt Lake City, Utah: For purchase of site and commencement of construction of building, $75,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. On page 2, after line 22, I move to insert:

Public building at Camden, N. J.: For construction of building, $25,000, and the limit of cost of said building is increased $125,000.

Mr. WARREN. On page 64, after the word "hundred," in line 5, I move to insert "and fifty"; so as to read:

For geological surveys in the various portions of the United States, $150,000, to be immediately available.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope that amendment will not be agreed to. I make the point of order that the appropriation proposed is higher than the estimate. The estimate is only $100,000, and the amendment is beyond the estimate.

Mr. WARREN. I desire to state that the amendment was submitted to a committee of this body and the committee unanimously recommended it. However, I do not wish to press it against the wishes of the Senator in charge of the bill. I believe that it ought to pass. I withdraw it simply in deference to the chairman of the committee, and for no other reason.

Mr. ALLISON. I am glad the Senator has done so. I ask that the amendment on page 113, which was passed over, be considered now.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment passed over will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 113, after line 14, the Committee on Appropriations reported to insert:

Purchase of historical publications: That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to purchase from Gen. James D. McBride 2,500 complete sets of his historical publications, entitled Important Periods in the History of the United States, Portraits of the Presidents of the United States, and the Seal of the United States and Seals of the Executive, Judicial, and Legislative Departments of the Government; and that said publications be distributed by the Secretary of the Senate as follows: One set for the use of the Senate of the United States, 1 set for the use of the House of Representatives, 3 sets to each Senator, Representative, and Delegate in Congress; 1 set to the President, 1 set to the Vice-President, 1 set to the Chief Justice of the United States, 1 set to each associate justice, 1 set to each member of the Cabinet, 1 set to the Executive Mansion, and 1 set to each of the Executive Departments, 1 set to the Supreme Court of the United States, 1 set to the Congressional Library; 43 sets to the Department of State for distribution among the various United States embassies and legations; 88 sets to the War Department for distribution among the various military post schools, including 1 set to the Military Academy at West Point and 5 sets to the National Homes for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers; 2 sets to the Department of Justice for the use of the United States prison; 78 sets to the Navy Department for distribution among the various vessels of the United States having libraries, including 1 set to the Naval Academy at Annapolis; 48 sets to the Department of Agriculture for distribution among the various agricultural colleges in the United States and Territories, and 800 sets to the Commissioner of Education for distribution among the various public libraries and educational institutions in the United States. And the sum of $12,500 is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to enable the said Secretary of the Senate to carry into effect the provisions of this act.

Mr. PEPPER. I ask that the unfinished business may be laid before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 9 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A resolution, by Mr. PEPPER, providing for a committee of five Senators to investigate and report generally all the material facts and circumstances connected with the sale of United States bonds by the Secretary of the Treasury in the years 1894, 1895, and 1896.

Mr. PEPPER. I ask that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside in order that we may proceed with the appropriation bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee on page 113.

Mr. GEORGE. I should like to know something about that amendment. It seems to be a very large gift by the Congress of the United States. I should like to have it explained. I want to know something about it.

Mr. TELLER. I can not hear what the Senator is saying.

Mr. GEORGE. I should like to have the amendment explained. I want to know why we ought to expend money for this purpose. There must be some reason for it.

Mr. SHOUP. In the early part of the session a bill for this purpose was introduced and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor. The bill was then referred to a subcommittee, who corresponded with the heads of the Departments and had a favorable report from the Secretary of State, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of Agriculture, the Secretary of the Navy, the Attorney-General, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Commissioner of Education. The subcommittee reported favorably on the bill. The bill received the favorable consideration of the Committee on Education and Labor and was reported to the Senate. This is a very valuable collection. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] has in his possession the correspondence with the Departments and is more familiar with the points set forth by the different Secretaries and the Attorney-General and the Commissioner of Education.

Mr. TELLER. The amendment is not the act of the Committee on Appropriations upon its own motion. The amendment came, as stated, from the Committee on Education and Labor, and it came to us with the indorsement of that committee and the indorsement of every Department of the Government. The amount to be appropriated is $12,500. The publications consist of several charts, the first being what was called the Centennial chart, gotten up in 1876 by the author, Mr. McBride, containing the names of all the officers of the Government at that time, including Senators and Members of the House of Representatives, etc., with the Declaration of Independence and some other matters attached. Since that time he has added five other charts, which include the seals of the States, steel engravings of the Presidents of the United States, and various other things, making five or six charts. I will read from the correspondence on the subject, and I am going to ask to put it entire in the RECORD, if the amendment is adopted, for the benefit of the Committee on Appropriations. The Secretary of State says—I will not read it all—

This work contains, in a highly compact and convenient form, much historical information, a knowledge of which will always be most useful to the people of our country.

That is in response to the bill that was sent to him with a request to state whether he had any objection to it. He said he would be glad to send copies to our different embassies. The Secretary of War recommends it also. He says:

I take pleasure in stating that they are considered by this Department of great interest and value.

The Secretary of the Navy indorses it and says that he desires it for the libraries on the ships.

The Secretary of Agriculture speaks of it in high terms and says:

I cordially indorse the proposition to distribute these valuable historical charts among the various agricultural colleges in the United States and Territories.

Then the Secretary of the Interior indorses it, and with it he sends the letter of the Commissioner of Education, Mr. Harris, which is quite a lengthy letter, and which I will have read if anyone desires to hear it. He says:

A gift of these charts would be a valuable gift to any one of these schools, and if it is intended to distribute to these elementary schools the matter can be best managed by sending first the proper quota to each of the 800 city superintendents, etc.

And he indorses it in the highest terms. I believe several educational societies have indorsed it from time to time. It seems to me that it is a matter we could hardly overlook. The committee felt that with these indorsements, as the sum is small, they ought to put the amendment in the bill, and we put it in. The committee have no other interest in it than anybody else.

The letters referred to are as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, March 11, 1896.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge receipt of your letter of March 3 instant, inclosing copy of Senate bill 2306, "A bill providing for the purchase and distribution of certain historical publications therein named."

In response to your request for my views of that part of the bill with which this Department is concerned, I have the honor to advise you that not only do I see no objection to it, but the Department will be glad to receive copies of General McBride's publications for distribution to the several embassies and legations of the United States. This work contains, in a highly compact and convenient form, much historical information, a knowledge of which will always be most useful to the people of our country.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

RICHARD OLNEY.

THE HON. JAMES H. KYLE,
United States Senate.

WAR DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE ASSISTANT SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., March 27, 1896.

DEAR SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your communication of the 3d instant, inclosing Senate bill No. 2306, "providing for the purchase and distribution of certain historical publications therein named."

I have examined the historical charts submitted by Gen. James D. McBride, and take pleasure in stating that they are considered by this Department of great interest and value.

If Congress should see fit to supply the Department with them, or to pass the bill referred to, that portion of the bill referring to the War Department should be amended to read substantially as follows:

"Ninety sets to the War Department, for distribution to military post schools, the military service schools, the Military Academy at West Point, and, if any remain, to be distributed in the discretion of the Secretary of War."

Very respectfully, yours,

JOSEPH B. DOE,
Assistant Secretary of War.

HON. JAMES H. KYLE,
Committee on Education and Labor, United States Senate.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, March 5, 1896.

SIR: Answering yours of the 3d instant, in which you ask for the views of the Department touching the provisions of Senate bill 2306, lines 16, 17, and 18, page 2, which provide that 78 sets of the proposed publication be furnished the Navy Department for distribution among the various vessels of the United States having libraries, including 1 set to the Naval Academy at Annapolis, the Department is of opinion that this number of sets could be distributed with advantage as indicated and would be of value in these libraries. There are not as many as 78 ships now having libraries, but the spare numbers might be retained for future use and some of them also sent to the Naval War College and to the Torpedo Station.

Very respectfully,

H. A. HERBERT,
Secretary.

HON. JAMES H. KYLE,
Chairman Subcommittee on Education and Labor,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, Washington, D. C., March 22, 1896.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of March 2, inclosing a copy of Senate bill No. 2306, providing for the purchase and distribution of certain historical publications therein named. In response to your request for my views on that part of the bill contained in lines 23 and 24, page 2, I have the honor to advise you that this Department will be glad to receive copies of General McBride's publications, as provided for in the bill. These charts appear to have been prepared with great care, and I have no doubt will prove of inestimable value as a means of ready instruction to the officers and employees of the Government.

Respectfully,

HOLMES CONRAD,
Acting Attorney-General.

HON. JAMES H. KYLE,
United States Senate.

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.

OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., March 25, 1896.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your communication of the 3d instant, inclosing Senate bill No. 2306, "providing for the purchase and distribution of certain historical publications therein named."

I have examined carefully the historical charts originated by Gen. James D. McBride, entitled "Important Periods in the History of the United States," "Portraits of the Presidents," and "The Seal of the United States and Seals of the Executive, Judicial, and Legislative Departments of the Government," and take pleasure in stating that I cordially indorse the proposition to distribute these valuable historical charts among the various agricultural colleges in the United States and Territories.

There is so much in them to inspire patriotism, that I earnestly hope the time will come when they will be found upon the walls of every school and educational institution in this country.

Very respectfully,

J. STERLING MORTON, Secretary.

HON. JAMES H. KYLE,
Committee on Education and Labor, United States Senate.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, Washington, March 10, 1896.

SIR: Replying to your communication of January 27, in which you inclose copy of Senate bill 1759, providing for the purchase and distribution of certain historical publications therein named, I have the honor to transmit herewith a copy of the report of the Commissioner of Education, to whom, in compliance with your request, said communication and bill were referred for an expression of "his views as to the educational worth of these publications and the advisability of their being distributed among the various public libraries and educational institutions of the United States."

Very respectfully,

HOKE SMITH, Secretary.

HON. GEORGE L. SHOUP,
Chairman Committee on Education and Labor,
United States Senate.

[Copy.]

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, D. C., January 23, 1896.

SIR: I herewith acknowledge the receipt of your communication of present date referring to me a bill from Hon. GEORGE L. SHOUP, chairman of the Committee on Education and Labor of the Senate of the United States, requesting my views as to the educational worth of certain publications edited and prepared by Gen. James D. McBride, intended to illustrate important periods in the history of the United States, the same to be placed in public libraries, common schools, and other educational institutions for the purpose of interesting and instructing the people in the history of their Government and thereby tending to patriotism. I am requested to furnish an opinion as to the educational worth of these publications and the advisability of their being distributed among the various public libraries and educational institutions of the United States, and am requested to further state what in my judgment would be the proper number to supply to said institutions.

I have the honor to state that I have examined the several publications referred to and found that they present, among other things, authentic portraits of the Presidents of the United States; "the seal of the United States and seals of the executive, judicial, and legislative departments of the Government." It is admitted that one of the important means of interesting and thereby educating people in their government is the opportunity of seeing and studying important historical documents and symbols of sovereignty and authenticity, such as the Declaration of Independence and the several seals; the portraits of the persons who have been raised to the highest office in the gift of the Government. It seems to me that a set of charts like those prepared by General McBride, constituting a complete history of the subject-matter considered, should be placed in each of the schools of the country, and in each of the public libraries. This Bureau has prepared a list of 4,000 public libraries, each containing not less than 1,000 volumes. I would suggest that the first order in the Senate bill No. 1759, of which a copy has been handed me, should specify that 4,000 complete sets of the historic publications should be presented through this Bureau to the public libraries of the United States. Second in order after the public libraries, I would recommend that the public high schools of the country, in the number of 4,122, be supplied with sets of this chart, and 1,650 copies be provided for the corporate, endowed, and other secondary schools of same rank as the high schools herein mentioned. The normal schools for the education of teachers, to the number of 300, should be furnished one set each, and next after this in order of importance should come what are called the district schools, varying in size from those containing 1 teacher and 20 to 50 pupils up to those containing 25 teachers and 1,500 pupils. Of these schools there are in the United States upward of 228,000. A gift of these charts would be a valuable gift to any one of these schools, and if it is intended to distribute to these elementary schools, the matter can be best managed by sending first the proper quota to each of the 800 city superintendents, enrolling nearly 3,600,000 of the elementary pupils taught by nearly 60,000 teachers.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

W. T. HARRIS, Commissioner.

The honorable SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

MR. GEORGE. I should like to ask the Senator from Colorado one question. What is the exceptional condition of this particular publication different from any other good publication which requires its purchase by the United States Government?

MR. TELLER. It is a historical chart that has been specially adapted, the author and friends think, to presenting in a concise and attractive form the history of the country. It contains particularly the Centennial year, which was, as we know, a very important year, and then it contains what is called the Columbian year, also.

MR. GORDON rose.

MR. TELLER. I see the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GORDON] on the floor. He introduced the amendment, and I will allow him to make a statement.

MR. GORDON. I was merely going to add to what the Senator from Colorado has said that it has been my privilege to look into this matter very carefully. I was deeply interested in it myself. I really think that it would be a desideratum for every school in America to have the chart. I learned from it myself in a very brief space many points of interest in the history of our country.

I think it is a very small amount of money to be appropriated for a purpose so patriotic and so necessary—the education of the youth of our country in its great points of history in the past.

Mr. HAWLEY. I would suggest to the Senator having the amendment in charge that there ought to be more than one copy each for the two Houses. Such books I know from experience which are desirable in matters of amusement or instruction are apt to be taken from the library and lost. I think there ought to be two copies for each of the two Houses.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McMILLAN. On page 26, line 24, I move to increase the salary of the Superintendent of the Coast and Geodetic Survey from $5,000 to $6,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PEPPER. On page 81, line 2, before the word "thousand," I move to strike out the word "fifty" and insert "seventy-five"; so as to read:

To continue the construction of buildings at the Fort Riley (Kans.) military post, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, $75,000.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not object to that amendment. Inadvertently I offered an amendment with reference to the same post, which I beg leave to withdraw.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PEPPER].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAWLEY. I offer an amendment indicated in the printed form to come in at line 23, page 17, but the bill has been reprinted, with many additions, and the pages and lines are changed. It is now line 20, page 21, after the words "Revised Statutes," the amendment referring to the printing of stamps by contract.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Connecticut submits an amendment, which will be read.

The SECRETARY. After the words "Revised Statutes," line 20, page 21, insert the following proviso:

Provided, That on and after the 1st day of January, 1897, no postage stamps shall be manufactured or furnished by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing; but said stamps shall be procured by the Post-Office Department as formerly, under the provisions of section 3709 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, requiring such work to be given out upon competitive bidding, after public advertisement for proposals.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I object to that amendment.

Mr. PEPPER. Before the amendment is agreed to—

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection being interposed, a vote will be taken upon the amendment.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Senator from Minnesota objects to the amendment I have proposed?

Mr. NELSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. PEPPER. Before the vote is taken—

Mr. HAWLEY. I have certain things to say before the vote is taken. The first is to ask for a call of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Allison,	Clark,	Mantle,	Shoup,
Bacon,	Frye,	Martin,	Stewart,
Bate,	Gallinger,	Mitchell, Oreg.	Teller,

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHILTON in the chair). Forty-nine Senators have answered to their names. The presence of a quorum is disclosed.

Mr. NELSON. I make a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. HAWLEY. What is the point of order?

Mr. NELSON. That it is obnoxious to the rule, inasmuch as it changes existing law. By existing law the printing of the stamps is done at the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. The object of the amendment is to take it away from the Bureau. It is in opposition to the existing law and changes existing law. It is in the nature of general legislation. I understand that by existing law the printing of the stamps is done at the Bureau of Printing and Engraving, while the object of the amendment is to take it away from the Bureau and provide a different method for securing the printing of the stamps.

Mr. HAWLEY. I should like to have the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations and also of the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

The point is made that this is a change of existing law. The Senator from Minnesota insists that the law now provides for the stamps being printed by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. Has there been any change of the existing law which requires that it shall be let by contract?

Mr. ALLISON. I do not think there has been any change of law.

Mr. HAWLEY. The law stands as before, I understand. That was my impression, and so I am informed by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. PLATT. The law, section 3709, is this:

All purchases and contracts for supplies or services in any of the Departments, etc., shall be made by advertising a sufficient time previously for proposals respecting the same when the public exigencies do not require the immediate delivery of the articles.

As I understand the matter, the Bureau of Printing and Engraving has no right whatever to compete for this work. It is the duty of the Postmaster-General under the law as it now exists—

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. The Bureau not only competed, but it put in a bid, I understand, after all the other bids were in.

Mr. WOLCOTT. And opened.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. And opened.

Mr. PLATT. What I was going to say is that I do not understand that the Bureau of Engraving and Printing has any authority to compete for this work.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. None whatever.

Mr. HAWLEY. It is not a corporation.

Mr. PLATT. And the work is now being done by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing in opposition to the law. The object of the amendment is to restore the law and insist upon its performance.

Mr. HAWLEY. I am much obliged to Senators, and that is just my view of it. I may add that if the amendment proposed a change of existing law, if I am not mistaken in the rules of the Senate, the fact that it has been unanimously approved by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads would take it out of the objection.

Mr. ALLISON. I am not sure, if the Senator from Connecticut will allow me to interrupt him, but that the last clause of his amendment does change existing law.

Mr. PLATT. What is it?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair failed to hear the remark of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. ALLISON. I think the last clause of the Senator's amendment, as I heard it read at the desk, does change existing law. That is to say, the Postmaster-General can now advertise, under existing law, and award the contract to the lowest or best bidder. That is precisely what was done two or three years ago. The Postmaster-General advertised for bids, and when all the bids came in he rejected them all and made a contract with the Bureau of Engraving and Printing; but the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut, I believe, requires him to accept the lowest and best bid, which I think the law does not require.

Mr. HAWLEY. I will strike out those lines and say he shall do it under section 3709 of the Revised Statutes. That would not change existing law.

Mr. ALLISON. I think not.

Mr. HAWLEY. Then I will strike out all after the words "United States," in line 7, and make it conform to existing law.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The modification will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all of the amendment after the words "United States," as follows:

Requiring such work to be given out upon competitive bidding, after public advertisement for proposals.

Mr. HAWLEY. That is what he would have to do under the statute.

Mr. PEPPER. How will the amendment read then?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Provided, That on and after the 1st day of January, 1897, no postage stamps shall be manufactured or furnished by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing; but said stamps shall be procured by the Post-Office Department as formerly, under the provisions of section 3709 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President—

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the Senator from Minnesota allow me to explain my own amendment?

Mr. NELSON. I wish to say on the point of order—the Senator can explain the amendment—that the amendment changes existing law in that it absolutely prohibits the Post-Office Department from having the Bureau of Engraving do the work. It is an absolute veto. Even under existing law there is nothing to hinder the Government from employing the Bureau of Engraving and Printing to do the work. The amendment is an absolute veto of it, and to that extent it changes the letter and the spirit of existing law.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, I hold that there is no statute anywhere and no proper usage of the Government which permits one of its bureaus to enter into competition and bid for all the work that is being done. If the Senator's view is correct, why has not the Navy Department a right, under section 3709, to bid for the building of ships? Why should not the Post-Office Department bid for the manufacture of mail bags and all the various mechanical appliances that are used in that service? Why should not every Department of the Government bid for the manufacture of everything that it has or uses or gets now under contract?

Mr. GRAY. How can a Department bid?

Mr. HAWLEY. I should like to know myself.

Mr. GRAY. The Departments are supported by the taxes of the people and they can underbid any contractor, and then the people will have to pay the bill.

Mr. HAWLEY. The people have to pay the bill anyhow. They have to pay no matter how much in excess the expenditures of the Department may run. The people of the United States have to pay it. The Departments are not corporations. They are in no legal sense of the word persons at all. They are created for another purpose; not for the purpose of manufacturing, but simply for the purpose of administering the laws as they stand upon the statute books. It took a specific statute to create the Bureau of Engraving and Printing and specify its work. Its work has been specified. It has been doing its work. Some of it is done very satisfactorily. When private persons or what are called private corporations, as distinguished from Government institutions, did the work it was done to the universal acceptance of the people of the United States. The engraving was exquisite; the paper was substantial, good; the ink was good; the gum was satisfactory. No complaint was heard for a long series of years, and the price was down to what to the uninitiated would seem to be a ridiculously low figure.

After the bids of those persons were put in, varying considerably, one of them running down, I believe, to $150,000 for the whole number of postage stamps, thousands of millions of them, and some days after the bids were opened, the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, desiring to magnify its office, was permitted to see the bids and to put in a lower bid. If it had been an authorized bidder that would have been a very unfair transaction.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from Connecticut allow me to ask him a question? Ought not the Government of the United States to be nearer and dearer to us than any private concern?

Mr. HAWLEY. No, sir; not in this matter, and not in a great many others. The Government of the United States is not here to nurse a Department of the Government. We are here to do the work in the cheapest way and the best way it can be done for the people.

Mr. PEPPER. Are we not doing that now?

Mr. HAWLEY. No, sir; we are not doing it so cheaply. I challenge investigation in that respect. Why does not the Bureau of Engraving and Printing reply honestly and candidly and in detail to the inquiries legitimately addressed to it upon that subject? I hold it to be a very bad policy, especially as to bidding against private parties, to go out and take their work and do it by governmental agencies. It is unfair competition. The Government, under this form of bidding, can do the work nominally and by pretense cheaper than an individual can bid. It may bid a cent a thousand for the stamps.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I should like to suggest, because the whole subject is being so thoroughly stated by the Senator from Connecticut, that this bid, unfairly proposed after the bids had been opened, was apparently for something over $50,000 cheaper, with the result that they have already spent nearly that amount in machinery; that the bid did not include rent, or fuel, or lights, or the use of machinery, or interest upon the cost of the plant; that 42 per cent of the stamps so manufactured were unfit for use; that the Bureau has fallen 14 per cent short of supplying the number it contracted for. Upon any fair estimate it has cost the Government 40 to 50 per cent more than if done by private individuals; and the Bureau has made a miserable mess of it instead of furnishing decent stamps, as the different bank-note companies did.

Mr. HAWLEY. I am very much obliged to the Senator from Colorado, for he has made substantially all the speech that is necessary to be made on this question. Every word he has said can be fortified by reference to the record. It appears that after repeated inquiries by the House of Representatives, if I may be allowed to make that reference to the other branch, after repeated inquiries by the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations, it was impossible to obtain a satisfactory reply from the Bureau of Engraving and Printing as to the details of its work; and when the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate made a similar inquiry he got a reply which, if it is satisfactory to him, and as to that I am not informed, was not satisfactory to anybody else. We never yet have been able to get the proper details of the actual expenditure, nor a correct statement, if I understand the matter, of the enormous loss and waste that came from doing botched and bad work.

Now, the chief of the Bureau came here something like a year ago to get a deficiency appropriation to carry out the work of the year ending June 30, 1895, and he spent about all of his additional appropriation. He represented to the subcommittee on the sundry civil bill that he was making economies in various directions; that he had reduced the wages of printers engaged on internal-revenue stamps at the rate of about $33,000 per annum in order that he might get money enough to make the post-office stamps.

He represented that he had reduced the wages of printers engaged on internal-revenue stamps at the rate of about $33,000 per annum, amounting from the date of the reduction to the close of the fiscal year 1895 to about $11,000, and that the cost of materials was much less.

That I do not know about.

The undeniable fact—

I am quoting now from a very interesting speech—

The undeniable fact was that he was obliged to skin his annual appropriations in every direction to meet the extra expenditure involved in the production of postage stamps over and above the amount which he was paid for the same by the Post-Office Department, and even then he came out barely ahead.

The work has never satisfied the public. It was obtained unfairly. It is in general against public policy. As I say, the case has been altogether stated. I have before me columns of matter all fortifying what has been said by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT] and myself.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, it has been the established policy of the Government for a number of years, after a sad experience to the contrary, to engrave and print all forms of its public securities—

Mr. HAWLEY. That is right.

Mr. SHERMAN. Bonds of the United States, paper money that is circulated in the United States; and I see no reason why the same rule ought not to apply to postage stamps. We ought not to trust to any corporation to manufacture the stamps unless they are manufactured under the eyes of the officers of the United States. Even if it should cost more to the Government to print and engrave them, it is far better for the safety of the Government that all its certificates, all its obligations, should be printed under Government surveillance, with direct examination of Government officials. There is great danger, and there was danger years ago, that money would be printed, and sometimes it got into circulation, from paper printed by private corporations.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Will the Senator from Ohio permit me for just a moment in this connection?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Is the Senator from Ohio aware that since the postage stamps have been printed by private parties, and they were so printed until 1894, the only robbery that ever took place—and it was an extensive robbery—took place under the Bureau of Engraving and Printing?

Mr. SHERMAN. That makes no difference. The general principle will apply to postage stamps as well as to any other securities.

The Government ought to control the manufacture and handling of the stamps at every stage to the final execution of the stamps. That is the general policy. I am therefore opposed to intrusting any corporation or any set of individuals with the power to print money and stamp it with the authority of the United States. The postage stamp is a completed work, and there is great danger that there may, by possibility, be a leak in the delivery of the postage stamps and that the stamps will get into circulation at the loss of the Government. It would be difficult indeed to find out exactly the extent of the loss.

I think it is wise, as a matter of public policy, that the Government should print all of its paper obligations, from the smallest postage stamp up to a registered bond of the United States.

Mr. GRAY. May I ask the Senator from Ohio whether there was any dissatisfaction with the contract system before it was changed to the present system in 1894; and, if so, what the grounds of dissatisfaction were?

Mr. SHERMAN. The change was made so as to bring the printing of postage stamps under the general rule of the Government, and there must have been a good reason which influenced the action of Congress two years ago. It strikes me, therefore, that we had better stand by it, and if there is any defect in the organization of our Bureau of Engraving and Printing it ought to be corrected. Stamps should only be manufactured under the surveillance and the control of the Government.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I was waiting for the point of order to be decided, but I see that Senators are discussing the merits of the proposition, and I have a word or two to say.

Some weeks ago I was down to the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. I observed closely and carefully—I spent an hour or two in doing it—the work that is going on there, and I was agreeably surprised to see the skill and the order and the efficiency that were everywhere manifest in the work of that organization. The only criticism I have to offer is of the parsimony of the Government, our niggardliness here, in not giving those people better quarters, more room, instead of a little cramped-up hencoop, if I may use that expression, and I do not think of anything else that is more forcible, although I might think of something that would be more elegant, for they are sandwiched in; they are working along in little grooves, scarcely wider than the dais upon which our Presiding Officer sits—

Mr. HAWLEY. I wish the Senator from Kansas would speak a little more distinctly, so that I can hear what he is saying.

Mr. PEPPER. I was going on to say that the work which is now being done by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing is prompt, it is accurate, it is perfect, it is cheap. The only criticism I have to offer is of the parsimony of Congress in not giving to the Bureau more room, better buildings, more machinery. Within the two or three years that the Bureau of Engraving and Printing has been doing the work they have progressed from day to day, from week to week, from month to month, from year to year in the efficiency and excellence of their work. I thought at the time the change was made that it was an excellent one, that it would prove in the end beneficial.

I believe that every Department of the Government ought to do all of the Government's work that it can do or can accomplish. I believe we ought to build our own ships. I believe we ought to equip our own armies. I believe we ought to do everything that we can do in and of ourselves.

Mr. HAWLEY. Including the construction of railroads?

Mr. PEPPER. And to build railroads.

Mr. HAWLEY. That is what I thought.

Mr. PEPPER. Of course that disposes of the Senator's favorable view of what I was going to say. Yes, I would build our own roads. I would not go so far, however, I will say to the Senator from Connecticut, as to confiscate existing roads. I would let the present management go along as best they can. That is what they are doing now. But wherever and whenever a Department of the Government can perform its own work it ought to do so. Is there any reason why the Government should go outside of its own force to procure the manufacture of postage stamps, when it can be done so well and so accurately here close to headquarters?

I think what I have said is enough to express my view. I am very earnestly opposed to the amendment. I do hope that the Department will be permitted to go ahead as it is doing now and make its own stamps.

Mr. HAWLEY. As to the matter of conducting, through the Government, all the work and the manufacture of all the articles that the Government may need there has been a great deal of discussion in past years, and in some respects at least the policy has been irrevocably established.

The Senator from Kansas [Mr. PEPPER] said some things which I wished to have him say in order to complete the reductio ad absurdum of his own argument. He has said to us that the Government ought to build all of the railroads in the United States, and employ, of course, something in the neighborhood of—

Mr. PEPPER. The Senator from Connecticut perhaps did not understand me. I did not say the Government ought to build all of the railroads in the United States. The Government ought to build all the railroads that the Government needs.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Government needs every one over which the mail goes.

Mr. PEPPER. Very well; let it build them.

Mr. HAWLEY. It needs one as much as it needs the other.

Mr. PEPPER. Let it build them.

Mr. HAWLEY. We have discussed those things and have settled the general policy of the United States Government. Complaint is made that there would be a vast body of employees and of the power which they could exert under the influence of the Government—that is, of their employers.

There is a well-defined jealousy among the Senator's friends of the influence employers may exert, and the Government is the most wealthy and the most influential employer of them all. What is the total number of miles of railway in the United States now?

Mr. DAVIS. One hundred and seventy thousand.

Mr. HAWLEY. Imagine the Government of the United States with 175,000 or 180,000 miles of railroad, with nearly a million employees, immediately employed, and so at work in ancillary labor as to be practically at work under Government employ, and imagine that enormous force of men inevitably influenced more or less by leading persons, perhaps Government officers, or persons having them in charge. It used to be—

Mr. PEPPER. Will the Senator from Connecticut allow me?

Mr. HAWLEY. In a moment. That is very much better than to destroy the continuity of a Senator's remarks.

In old times it used to be thought very important that the collector of the port of New York should be taken from the party in control, because it used to be the fashion of half of the employees there to go up to a State convention and run the whole machine. Public sentiment has in a measure corrected that and there is very much less of it. But that illustrates what I was saying as to the wiser modern policy and the vicious old one, to which I am not desirous of returning.

It is proposed that the Government shall take charge not only of the railways, but of all the telegraph lines. It is proposed that the Government shall conduct the great savings-bank interests as well.

Now, elaborate the scheme at your leisure and see what an enormous machine the Government would come to be—how practically the power over everything that enters into our daily life would be centered in the Government, and in some cases at the very demand of the people who are all the while denouncing the Government as corrupt, denouncing the Senate and the House of Representatives, the President, and everybody else as unfit to conduct business. Yet they turn around the next day, and when they have a little bridge to build across a river they think they have done the prettiest thing in the world when they provide an engineer of the Army to build it, and in a thousand other ways display the powers of the Government. Is it fair, in a free government, that we should require or permit a great bureau, in the absence of law, to come in and look over the rest of the bids submitted by private citizens, put in one confessedly ridiculously low, get the contract, and then have a great deficiency raised in the conduct of the business? I shall be very much surprised and I shall regret if the Senate shall sustain a departure from what I think is sound policy, and I shall lament that a sort of sanction will have been given to a very unwise practice, an extravagant practice, on the part of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] says very properly that much of the work done by that fine Bureau has been excellently well done. I admit that, and I am proud of it. I have many of their engravings, obtained in one way and another, in the collection which I have, and it does some of the finest work done in the United States.

Mr. GRAY. Treasury notes.

Mr. HAWLEY. Not so much in that form as I would like.

It is quite right that the Government should print its own bonds, because there is a great sum of money involved. The number of bonds is not so great as the number of postage stamps, and the Government can keep a better record of them, a better account of them, and it does not make so much difference whether the work is in a measure shirked.

It is not absolutely necessary that a postage stamp, which is practically destroyed the moment it is used, should be as well done in every single respect as a bond, and we know what vexation there was by reason of poor gum, imperfect paper, and the dirty and inartistic colors upon the postage stamps; but there is no necessity in this case of this work going to the Government. There are no vast pecuniary interests liable to be injured here. A man would have to steal a very large number of stamps to get anything worth going to Canada for.

The answer to what has been claimed, that the work can be better done by the Government, is that it was done for a long series of years by private corporations, who have done a vast amount of bond and similar work for foreign governments, and they have just as much experience and skill in those concerns as can be found in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing here. They furnish South America and other countries with practically all the evidences of obligations that those countries have, and it has been done to absolute perfection. We went on years and years without any growling about it, unless it was as to the designs. I do not know who was responsible for some of the modern designs.

Mr. Thomas A. H. Hay, of Easton, Pa., makes this remark in a letter which happens to come under my eye just now:

If you will kindly get the report of the Auditor of the Treasury, showing the amount of money that was paid to the American Bank Note Company during the four years I was postage-stamp agent, you will find it is about half the amount of money used by the printing department in the manufacture of the stamps, and what miserable apologies for postage stamps we have had the past eighteen months.

Senators speak of doing this work under the charge of our own officers. It has all been done under our own officers; nothing has been done or is done under contracts with any of these private parties except under the close inspection of the Government agent, who has oversight and control of the paper, the ink, the presswork, the gum, the issue, and all that sort of thing. Nor was there ever a fraud dignified enough to get into history in connection with this work—none whatever, to my knowledge—while the business was conducted by the parties in New York.

Mr. PEPPER. The Senator from Connecticut does not say or intimate that the business of the Post-Office Department is not well conducted. There are somewhere in the neighborhood of 75,000 post-offices in the country; there are about 175,000 persons connected with these different offices.

Mr. HAWLEY. Is not that work enough for the Post-Office Department?

Mr. PEPPER. The distance that is traveled backward and forward in the transportation of the mails of the United States in the course of a year amounts to a line equal to about fifteen thousand times around the earth. It is the most stupendous business establishment in the world, and yet it is conducted with the systematic arrangement of clockwork by one man no larger than the Senator from Connecticut or myself, physically speaking, and it is done with perfection, and yet the Senator complains about the vast amount of power that will be concentrated in the Administration in case the principle involved in this discussion should be extended to other Departments of the Government.

Then the Senator undertakes to cast ridicule upon those who are taking the same view of the subject I do, because of the view that he and some other self-appointed critics allege that the party to which I belong holds. There is nothing in our political creed, so far as I am aware—and I think I know a good deal about it—that has ever looked toward the taking possession of the present railway systems of the United States and bringing the entire transportation business of the country immediately under Government control—nothing of that kind. We do believe that the people ought to have control of all of their own transportation interests; but, while that is true, we do not believe in the doctrine of the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL], who insists that while we are anxious at some time or other to procure the good will, and all that that implies, of the people of Cuba, we should therefore immediately go down and take possession of the island and take possession of the people. That is not our view of the situation at all, Mr. President. We do believe that the Government of the United States should control by Government agencies; that all public functions ought to be exercised by public agencies in one way or another. That is the fundamental principle and the doctrine of the party to which I have the honor to belong; but we do not propose to go about and make a holocaust of this business; we do not propose to tear everything down, as anarchists would, to destroy. We are builders, Mr. President; we are not destroyers. In some respects, perhaps, we might be called iconoclasts, because we are breakers of images, but they are party images. We are not dangerous at all.

The principle that is involved in the work that is going on in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing covers the whole ground, so far as the principle is concerned of public officers doing public work. This is purely public work; it is for the benefit of the people; and it is one of the agencies that Government has in carrying on its business, in carrying on the work of the Post-Office Department, which has grown in a little over one hundred years from an expenditure of about $22,000 a year to ninety-odd million dollars a year, and from 75 post-offices in the entire country in 1790 to some 75,000 post-offices in 1896; from an entire transportation distance of about 1,875 miles to over 450,000 miles to-day; and with the accuracy of its performance, with the perfection of its expansion, and all those things, the wonder is, Mr. President, why Senators should object to this work being done by the Government. I know of no other reason for it unless it be the interests of private parties who are anxious to do this work. The labor must be done somewhere. Why not do it under the eye of the Government?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair sustains the point of order made by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON].

Mr. PLATT. I desire to take an appeal from that decision.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut appeals from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, do I understand an appeal has been taken from the decision of the Chair?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. An appeal has been taken.

Mr. NELSON. Under those circumstances, inasmuch as the discussion has passed off from the point of order into a discussion upon the merits of the question, by a sort of unanimous consent, I want to take up about five minutes of the time of the Senate with a few remarks upon the merits of this question, as the discussion seems to have been mainly devoted to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. PLATT. An appeal from the decision of the Chair on the point of order is debatable, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, years ago most of the printing of the Government was done through private firms. The proceedings of these two Houses were printed in the Congressional Globe by private parties. All that system has been changed. We have a Government Printing Office here in the northwest, the best equipped and most perfect of its kind in the whole world, and all the printing of the Government—its reports, its bills, and, the most marvelous thing of all, a RECORD of the legislative proceedings—are printed there from day to day as perfectly and the work is as well done as it is possible to be done in any printing office on the face of the earth. I do not think that this body or the American people, so far as that printing is concerned, would like to go back to the old system, the old method of doing things.

What we have done in that line we have done in the other line of printing in the finer work. We have established a Bureau of Engraving and Printing, where we print our bonds, all our different bank notes, Treasury notes, gold certificates, silver certificates, national-bank notes, and stamps of various kinds. This printing is and has been done in a manner satisfactory and equal to the best in the world. There is no country on the face of the earth that has finer paper currency than the United States of America. I have seen any number of paper notes, and I have not yet seen any kind of paper currency equal to our own paper currency.

The Bureau of Engraving and Printing has been in successful operation, and now, in this year of our Lord 1896, because some firm is disappointed in its bid, because some firm has not the privilege of printing these stamps, because the Government has assumed to do that, what are we told? We are told all at once that this Bureau of Engraving and Printing, which prints the best paper money in the world, which can do as fine and as good printing as any printing institution in the world, is incompetent to print our postage stamps. I never knew that the people of the United States were suffering from bad postage stamps until it was told to me here on the floor of the Senate. For the last year I have been licking postage stamps unconsciously, and I never knew how bad they were until the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads told me. It is passing strange, Mr. President, that this Bureau, which is competent to print the best kind of greenbacks, the best kind of national-bank notes, which can print beer and tobacco stamps, is all at once found incompetent to print postage stamps.

Sir, are we running this Government for the interests of the Government or are we running it for disappointed bidders? We have a Bureau of Engraving and Printing here, fully equipped, with a good force, which is run honestly and economically. The printing of postage stamps is only an incident to its general work. It can do this fine work just as well as it can do all the other work of the Government. Having established it, why should we single out this matter of postage stamps and take it away from the Government simply because some bidders somewhere in the Northeast have been disappointed in bidding for the printing of Government postage stamps?

Mr. President, we ought to think twice before we take this step. The people of this country are in favor of supporting their Government just as it stands. We have a Government Printing Office here in the northwest for doing our ordinary and everyday printing. You might as well come forward at this time and say that office is incompetent to print our RECORD; that our RECORD is dirty and nasty and we ought to let it to some private printer; that our documents and reports are not gotten out rapidly, and we ought to submit their printing to private enterprise.

It will not do to lug in this question of Populism about Government ownership of railroads and to attempt to throw discredit on the Government. You might as well attempt to bring that in to throw discredit on the Government in the management of its Post-Office Department. We run that Post-Office Department successfully, we run our Government Printing Office over here successfully, and we run the Bureau of Engraving and Printing successfully, and I do not think anybody will want to have any of them dismantled and destroyed. Why should we do in a roundabout and insidious manner what we would not do openly and aboveboard?

The Bureau of Engraving and Printing is competent to do our finer work. Look at the printing of bank notes. Why is it not competent to print an inferior grade of postage stamps? Let us stand by our colors and stand by our Government. It is our Government; let us smoke its pipe in peace and wield its tomahawk in war.

Mr. GORMAN. I understand the Chair has ruled the amendment not to be in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. GORMAN. And that there has been an appeal taken from the decision of the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. An appeal has been taken from the decision of the Chair by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT].

Mr. GORMAN. I understand discussion is not in order.

Mr. PLATT. Discussion is perfectly in order, as I understand, upon an appeal from the decision of the Chair. That is debatable.

Mr. GORMAN. Then I desire to say only a word or two, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. GORMAN. That this amendment is legislation, pure and simple, I do not think there can be the slightest doubt. In the Post-Office appropriation bill of this year will be found an item appropriating "for manufacture of adhesive postage stamps and special-delivery stamps, $160,000." When the appropriation was made placing that amount in the hands of the Postmaster-General, of course it would have been, I suppose, within the rules to put in a limitation in regard to the expenditure. The opportunity for that, however, passed. Now comes the sundry civil bill, which has no reference whatever to the appropriation for printing postage stamps, when a new provision of law is attempted to be inserted. I submit that there can not be any question that this is legislation pure and simple.

Mr. PLATT. I beg the Senator's pardon. That was not the point of order which was decided. The point of order the Chair decided was that the proposed amendment would change existing law, and was therefore obnoxious to the rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Connecticut that the Senator from Minnesota made two points: First, that the amendment would change existing law, and secondly, that it constituted general legislation. The Chair did not sustain him on the first, because the first clause of the rule refers only to the question of increasing appropriations or adding a new item of appropriation. But the Chair sustained the second point of order made by the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. PLATT. It must have been when I was out of the Chamber, then. I was called away.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair inquires of the Senator from Minnesota if he did not make both points?

Mr. NELSON. The Chair is correct.

Mr. GRAY. I hope the Chair will state the ground of his decision, if it will not interrupt the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. GORMAN. Certainly not. I should be glad to hear the ground of the decision.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The ground of the decision is simply that the amendment proposes to absolutely prohibit the Bureau of Engraving and Printing from printing stamps in the future, and the Chair believes that such a provision must be fairly termed "general legislation."

Mr. GORMAN. And it changes existing law.

Mr. President, as an appeal has been taken from the decision of the Chair, as a matter of course it is usual in such cases to discuss the merits of the question. The Postmaster-General in 1894, in permitting the Bureau of Engraving and Printing to do this work, had, I think, authority under existing law to make that arrangement. The statement of the case by the Department, which is a very strong one, is that the printing of all the stamps, bank notes, and Treasury notes can best be done and more safely be done and much more economically be done by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing than by private parties.

In the first six months after the Bureau of Engraving and Printing undertook to do this work they had not the facilities, nor had they so many skilled men as were found in the American Bank Note Company and other companies which had theretofore been doing it. During that time there was an inefficiency, if you please; certainly the work was not quite so well executed. Since then the Bureau has performed the duty to the entire satisfaction of the Government; and from what information comes to me and from the examination I have made of the matter, their work to-day is equal to the best work heretofore done by the note companies, and is certainly satisfactory to the Post-Office Department.

It is claimed that in 1893 the cost of postage stamps to the Government was $312,110, and in 1894 it was $338,745. The only appropriation asked for doing the same work by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing was $160,000. It may be said in answer to that that there is in the present cost of $160,000 no estimate whatever for interest upon the plant, or for interest and wear and tear upon the fifty or sixty thousand dollars' worth of machinery which it was necessary to place in the Bureau to do the work of printing postage stamps; and to that extent the statement is true.

Mr. HAWLEY. Let me ask the Senator another question, if he will be so kind as to yield for that purpose. Whereabouts in the sundry civil bill now before us is to be found a definition or limitation of the money to be expended for stamps? A lump sum is applied to the Bureau of Engraving and Printing just as it was in previous years, but no mention whatever is made there of the stamp business. How has the existing law been changed?

Mr. GORMAN. I will say to the Senator that he has made a mistake in the bill to which he has offered the amendment. If he will refer to the Post-Office appropriation bill, which passed some days ago, on page 8 of that bill he will find a specific appropriation "for manufacture of adhesive postage stamps and special-delivery stamps, $160,000." That sum is to be expended under the direction of the Postmaster-General, and he contracts with the Bureau of Engraving and Printing for all the printing of stamps, and, as they are delivered they are paid for out of that appropriation.

Mr. HAWLEY. There is nothing there said about giving the job to the Bureau of Engraving and Printing.

Mr. GORMAN. Nothing whatever.

Mr. HAWLEY. Section 3709 of the Revised Statutes provides that such work shall be upon public bidding.

Mr. GORMAN. If the Senator is correct about that, as a matter of course the Post-Office Department has been at fault; but I understand the Postmaster-General in making this arrangement with the Bureau of Engraving and Printing consulted the Attorney-General and the law officers of the Government, who advised that under this appropriation for postage stamps the Postmaster-General had a right to disburse the money as he is now doing under this contract.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Senator from Maryland will allow me to read section 3709, on page 733 of the Revised Statutes, to which I referred.

Mr. GORMAN. Certainly.

Mr. HAWLEY. That section reads as follows:

Sec. 3709. All purchases and contracts for supplies or services, in any of the Departments of the Government, except for personal services, shall be made by advertising a sufficient time previously for proposals respecting the same, when the public exigencies do not require the immediate delivery of the articles, or performance of the service. When immediate delivery or performance is required by the public exigency, the articles or service required may be procured by open purchase or contract, at the places and in the manner in which such articles are usually bought and sold, or such services engaged, between individuals.

That statute continues to be the law of the country, and has only been modified from time to time by little two-penny provisions in certain cases, as, for instance, that the engineers of the Navy Department may buy supplies under $200 or under $300, or something of that kind, for immediate necessities. That statute providing that all this work should be done under public proposals has not been touched at all, so far as I can find, by any of the bills which have been passed during the years in which this practice of working in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing has existed. I find no reference to it in what the Senator has read from the Post-Office appropriation bill. It gives so much money to the Postmaster-General, but it does not tell him he shall do the work in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. There is no specification of that Bureau anywhere.

Mr. GORMAN. No, Mr. President; there is no specific provision requiring the Postmaster-General to have this work done at the Bureau of Engraving and Printing; that is true; but the Senator will find upon examination that it has never been held that the statute which he has just read, which was for the purchase of the little departmental supplies, applied to the Post-Office Department in such a case as this. At all events, bids were asked for this work and they were received, in fact, from the bank-note companies. I think two bids were made by outside parties which were not satisfactory to the Post-Office Department for some reason.

Mr. HAWLEY. They were in the exact figures used in that appropriation bill.

Mr. GORMAN. I know they were not satisfactory.

Mr. HAWLEY. They were $150,000 and $160,000. Those were the outside bids.

Mr. GORMAN. They were not satisfactory to the Department, at all events. I do not know about the bids, but the Postmaster-General thought they were not satisfactory. He then asked for a proposition from the Bureau of Engraving and Printing; and I am inclined to think that it was after the other bids had been submitted and possibly had been opened.

Mr. HAWLEY. It was.

Mr. GORMAN. You may criticize the Postmaster-General for that action; that is another matter; but he was advised that he had the authority to contract with the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. He did so contract, and the contract has continued until this time, and it is claimed by the Bureau, and it would appear from the appropriations that we have made that the cost to the Government has been much less than it was under the old system.

Mr. President, I have shown the Senate the amount appropriated for this work. As to the other suggestion, that there is no charge made for interest on this great plant and machinery now in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, that is true, I admit.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, before the Senator from Maryland goes to the next point of his argument I wish to call his attention, and also the attention of the Senator from Connecticut, to the wording of the statute, where it is required that bids shall be proposed to furnish supplies. What I wanted to suggest to the Senator, and to all Senators, is that supplies do not mean the performance of work; it means paper, paste, ink, mucilage, and all those things which the Departments have to purchase from parties outside. I think that is all that is contemplated in the statute—the securing of the necessary supplies for doing this particular work.

Mr. GORMAN. In the bill which we are considering there is the general provision for an appropriation for all the work of this Department. It does not include postage stamps, but all the printing for the Treasury Department, all the bank notes and internal-revenue stamps. If the appropriations are less on this bill than they were one year ago, or two years ago when the contract for postage stamps was in the hands of private parties, and if the volume of the work of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing for the Treasury Department is greater, it would seem to demonstrate that the claim of the Superintendent of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing is correct, that he absolutely does the work for the Post-Office Department $150,000 cheaper than heretofore.

Mr. PEPPER. With our own plant.

Mr. GORMAN. With our own plant, and he assigns the reason why he can do it.

Mr. PEPPER. And under the civil service.

Mr. GORMAN. Yes; this Bureau is entirely under the civil service. The reason he assigns is because in this work he can utilize to some extent the same people who are engaged in printing stamps for the Internal Revenue Department, and keep his establishment going all the time.

Mr. HAWLEY. That is to say, he pays for stamp work partly out of the money appropriated for bond work, internal-revenue stamps, and—

Mr. GORMAN. No.

Mr. HAWLEY. That is what he said. He said he could equalize the work employed in printing internal-revenue stamps. So he expends it out of another fund in reality.

Mr. GORMAN. No; he claims not, and I say the figures would warrant his statement. He says that in 1894, the last year of printing stamps by a private concern, the cost of running the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, not a postage stamp then being printed, was $1,195,705.66. Now, for the next fiscal year, for the same purposes of his Bureau, with a greater amount of work, as he claims, because of the increased amount of internal-revenue printing and the extraordinary demand for small notes, bank notes, and Treasury notes of all sorts and descriptions, we are appropriating only $1,103,000, or eighty-four or eighty-five thousand dollars less than we appropriated the last year of the contract.

Mr. PEPPER. And doing vastly more work.

Mr. GORMAN. Doing vastly more work, as the Senator from Kansas suggests. If the Senate is to vote upon the merits of this question, I suggest, from the official figures furnished, there can not be any doubt about the economy of continuing the present work.

Now, as to the work itself. As I stated a moment ago, when the Bureau first began the printing of postage stamps there was for six months a good deal of trouble. They used the old dies of the American Bank Note Company, which had been purchased by the Government, and their printing of the stamps was not equal to the work of the American Bank Note Company's; but since then it is admitted, and admitted very frankly, by one of the ablest officers of the Government we have ever had, who is now, I think, interested in getting the work for private concerns, that, taking the last six months, the work of the Bureau is equal to anything we have had. They are making distinctive paper, and it is being made by the same firms with whom the private contractors contracted; and they have it in a shape that is almost as perfect as in the printing of national-bank notes and Treasury notes.

I think, on an appropriation bill, it would be unwise to prohibit the Post-Office Department from continuing this work. I think it was his predecessor and not the present Postmaster-General who made a mistake about it, and, if you will have a little patience we may have another Postmaster-General within a year who will change it, or, if it is considered wise to do it by legislation, let the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads take up the question of the whole of the expenditures under the Post-Office Department, and let us have some greater checks and balances, if it can be done, without interfering with the postal service.

There are no appropriations made by Congress of so large amounts as are placed in the hands of the Postmaster-General. Millions of money are absolutely in the hands of the Postmaster-General to determine without contracts and without public advertisement what railroad companies are to receive, and but for the fact that in all time past, so far as I know—there may have been a few small exceptions—every Postmaster-General has managed this great fund if not with economy, certainly with honesty. But it does seem that as this system is growing, as the country is growing, and as the corporations are demanding more every year for their services, it would be wise if the Post-Office Committee, after consultation with the Postmaster-General, were to bring in a bill restricting the power of the Postmaster-General, and requiring, if you please, contracts in all these cases.

The Senator from Connecticut and I have had discussions before on the general idea involved. I believe as a rule that safety and economy in all these matters are secured by having competition from outside sources with the Government. In the matter of printing bank notes, Treasury notes, and valuable securities there were good reasons why the Bureau of Engraving and Printing should be established. All sorts of abuses would have grown up in all probability but for that establishment. It was a wise provision and it ought not to be disturbed. The same consideration applies to a very great extent to postage stamps. It is claimed that under the bank-note contract no default ever occurred, but there is no way to follow that. One did occur under the present system with the Department here, but it was detected immediately, the men were soon arrested, convicted, and imprisoned. The same guarantees as to safety and the prevention of fraud are thrown around postage stamps that are thrown around the bank notes and Treasury notes. I do not believe the system ought to be changed at this time and changed in this way. Let the Post-Office Committee, if they desire to restrict the Postmaster-General, come in with a general provision covering all these subjects.

Mr. PLATT. I did not understand the ground upon which the Chair sustained the point of order, as I was called out of the Chamber. I thought it was upon the ground first suggested by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], that under Rule VII it proposes to change existing law. I understand now it was decided upon the ground that it is new legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes; under clause 3 of Rule XVI.

Mr. PLATT. Therefore I withdraw my appeal, and I submit another amendment, which I think is not open to the suggestion that it is not in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

Mr. SHERMAN. The appeal is withdrawn?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The appeal is withdrawn, the Chair understands. The amendment now proposed will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "statutes," in line 20, page 21, insert:

Provided, That, out of the sums appropriated for engraving and printing, the Bureau shall provide the full amount of internal-revenue stamps required by law, and the printing of postage stamps shall be done by contract to the lowest bidder.

Mr. HAWLEY. I concur in the amendment. I had an amendment to the same effect in my hands, intending to offer it if we were ruled out on the previous amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will hold the amendment now proposed to be in order.

Mr. HAWLEY. Now, I want to say just a few words. I shall not prolong the discussion. The Senator from Maryland has left the Chamber, I believe. He told us, I think, that the appropriation this year in the Post-Office bill was $160,000 for procuring postage stamps. As against $150,000 by private parties, the bid made by the Bureau two and a half years ago was $139,487.52. We will add a few dollars and call it $140,000. I had no idea the estimate was made so closely. Now, telling us that that would be cheaper than anybody else could do it for, they propose to give this year $10,000 more than private parties stand ready to do the work for. So I think there is no economy in the transaction. Anyhow, I think there is more safety and more economy and more political wisdom in the old practice we had.

I want to give a parting word to my friend the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PEPPER]. I do not wish to appear altogether ignorant of the principles of the great Populistic party. When I said that the Senator's associates desired to own the railroads, etc., he corrected me. He said that they desired to build such railroads as the Government might need. I have here the Tribune Almanac for 1895 with the platforms of the various conventions for many years. Here is the platform of the People's Party convention which met at Omaha July 2, 1892. Is that the particular branch of reform under which the Senator marches? I ask the Senator from Kansas is that his convention, the one that met at Omaha July 2, 1892?

Mr. PEPPER. July 4, I think.

Mr. HAWLEY. Then my statement is substantially correct. It said in its third resolution:

We believe that the time has come when the railroad corporations will either own the people or the people must own the railroads, etc.

And again, under the head of "Control of transportation":

Transportation being a means of exchange and a public necessity, the Government should own and operate the railroads in the interest of the people. The telegraph and telephone, like the post-office system, being necessities for the transmission of news, should be owned and operated by the Government in the interest of the people.

All that I said and more, too, is specified there in that platform. Then it goes on to say that practically the Government should own the lands, but that involves an argument—I do not include that. I am entirely justified in what I said by the letter of the platform.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT].

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I wish to say a word upon the amendment. To speak plainly, a persistent effort has been made by the bank-note engraving companies to force the Government of the United States to put this work into their hands under the competitive system. One of these companies is in the city of St. Louis, and I have received numerous letters urging upon me the propriety of supporting this legislation. I have come to the conclusion that I will do nothing of the sort, and I simply want to give my reason for it.

We have here a Bureau of Engraving and Printing, a most expensive one, where the finest kind of work in the way of engraving notes and securities and other papers of the Government is being done daily and hourly. I should like to know from some Senator why we should support this Bureau and at the same time put out a contract for the postage stamps for the whole people of the United States with outside parties?

The principal argument made by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY], I understand, is that the general provision of the statute requires that all supplies to furnish the Government and all contracts for services except personal services shall be put up to the lowest and best bidder. I can not believe that the framers of that law ever contemplated its application to a case of this sort. That has not been the practice of the Government.

But aside from that, I do not think the law itself would perpetrate any such absurdity. For instance, let us apply it to the Public Printing Office. Suppose that Congress orders 500,000 or 1,000,000 copies of any publication. Under the construction put by the Senator from Connecticut upon that general provision of the statute we would have immediately to advertise that that work should be done by the lowest and best bidder. Is it possible that the framers of the statute ever intended any such absurdity, that with this enormous Printing Office—the largest, possibly, in the world—we should allow all its machinery and all its workmen to remain idle while we put up to the highest bidder the publication of 1,000,000, 500,000, or 100,000 copies of any governmental publication? I do not think that was the meaning of the law. I do not believe it was ever contemplated that we should establish this Bureau of Engraving and Printing and then take the people's money and give it to outside parties, allowing the workmen and machinery of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing to remain idle. Therefore I shall vote against the amendment.

Mr. HAWLEY. I wish to say that the Senator's illustration of the Printing Office will not, in the common slang of the day, wash, because the Printing Office was established even before this law was passed, and nobody ever thought of providing and does not provide that the printing shall be done in this way. The work that has been done in other ways went on, and we had the Post-Office distinctly provided for by law for just that kind of work. If we had had a Bureau of Printing for just the work of printing stamps it would have been another affair, of course—it would have been perfectly legitimate to go on under that. But there is no thought of any interference with the Government Printing Office. Nobody can pretend to make a claim under the statute that the printing of 400,000 copies of the Agricultural Report should be let out, though I think it might be done cheaper. But no one objects to the existence of that splendid institution.

Mr. VEST. I submit with great respect that that is no answer to what I stated. Congress has enacted a statute which, under the construction of the Senator from Connecticut, requires that all services except personal services shall be put up to the lowest and best bidder. That statute, as a matter of course, was not retroactive, but it did affect all services except personal services for the future; and there is nothing whatever which would take the work of publishing the agricultural reports out of the operation of that statute. If it applies to one bureau or one Department it applies to all. I say, like the Senator from Connecticut, I do not think the framers of the statute ever intended it to apply either to the Bureau of Engraving and Printing or to the Public Printing Office.

Mr. HAWLEY. Does not the public printing go specifically to that office under the legislation from year to year?

Mr. VEST. It simply uses the words "public printing"; that all documents of the Government ordered by Congress or necessary for the Departments shall be printed by the Public Printer at the Public Printing Office. Afterwards this statute was enacted, which declared that all services except personal services—a most unfortunate expression, but passing by the verbiage—all services except personal services shall be put up to the lowest and best bidder. If the construction of the Senator from Connecticut is good as to the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, it is equally good as to every other bureau and Department of the Government of the United States.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, before the vote is taken, I wish to say that while the amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] differs somewhat from that proposed by his colleague, the substance is the same and the object aimed at is the same. I hope that the amendment will be voted down.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT].

Mr. GORMAN. Let the amendment be read again.

The SECRETARY. After the words "Revised Statutes," in line 20, on page 21, insert:

Provided, That out of the sum appropriated for engraving and printing the Bureau shall provide the full amount of internal-revenue stamps required by law, and the printing of postage stamps shall be done by contract to the lowest bidder.

Mr. GORMAN. Do I understand the Chair to rule that the latter part of the amendment is in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has ruled that the amendment is in order. The Chair thinks that there is some doubt as to the proper interpretation of the statute which has been read, but being in doubt, the Chair rules that the amendment is in order. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. ALLISON. If there are no further amendments, I ask that the bill be reported to the Senate. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BATE] I believe is withdrawn.

Mr. BATE. No, sir; it is not withdrawn. It was postponed temporarily. I do not ask any further postponement. I am perfectly willing that the amendment shall be acted upon at this time.

Mr. FRYE. Let the amendment be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is a ruling asked upon the amendment?

Mr. BATE. No; but I ask that the amendment be disposed of now.

Mr. ALLISON. I object to the amendment because it is a private claim, or rather a collection of private claims, and not in order upon this bill.

Mr. BATE. Mr. President, I have nothing to say about the amendment particularly, except that I wish to read section 4 of Rule XVI, which I am frank to say is rather against our view. The amendment was submitted by my colleague [Mr. HARRIS], who is not well enough to be here to-day. I am representing him, inasmuch as he introduced this amendment, but I represent likewise the interests he represents, for it concerns our people as well as many others in some fifteen States. The claims are small and numerous. The items have each and every one of them, however, been passed upon by the Court of Claims, and they have to that extent adjudicated the question as to loyalty and amount, and all have been certified up here.

Now, on the question of order made by the Senator from Iowa, who has this matter in charge, I will read clause 4 of Senate Rule XVI:

No amendment the object of which is to provide for a private claim—

Now, these are private claims, I admit—shall be received to any general appropriation bill unless it be to carry out the provisions of an existing law or a treaty stipulation, which shall be cited on the face of the amendment.

This is to carry out an existing law, and I think is sufficiently stated on the face of the amendment. There can be no question about it, for I read from the amendment itself to show what the law is and what we propose to carry out:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the several persons in this act named the several sums mentioned herein, the same being in full for, and the receipt of the same to be taken and accepted in each case as a full and final discharge of, the several claims examined, investigated, and reported favorably by the Court of Claims of the United States under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1883, entitled "An act to afford assistance and relief to Congress and the Executive Departments in the investigation of claims and demands against the Government," and known as the Bowman Act.

That is on the face of the amendment. So it conforms, I think, to that part of the requirement of section 4 of Rule XVI, where it is stated that if it is a claim it shall be cited on the face of the amendment.

I have nothing more to say about it. I am perfectly content that the Chair shall rule upon the point of order. I do not wish to detain the Senate. I must confess, sir, that I am in doubt about it myself. I am generally against such things, but I submit that, if having been introduced and presented, it was hoped that there would be no debate upon it and that it would be passed as some other matters of this kind are allowed to be passed upon appropriation bills, the point of order not being made. But the point of order having been made, we have to take action upon it. I thus present this view, and will abide the result.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair sustains the point of order raised against the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed. ✓

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6249) making appropriations for current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes, agreed to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SHERMAN, Mr. CURTIS of Kansas, and Mr. PENDLETON managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the second report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on certain amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6248) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes; further insisted upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 11, 12, 13, 14, 16, 19, 22, 23, 36, 37, 38, 83, 108, 109, 142, 144, 233, 305, 306, 307, 308, 309, 310, 313, and 314; asked a further conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. BINGHAM, Mr. McCALL of Tennessee, and Mr. DOCKERY managers at the further conference on the part of the House.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 1609) for the relief of Peter Fleming, Battery E, Third United States Artillery;

A bill (H. R. 1734) to increase the pension of Ann Catherine Hull;

A bill (H. R. 2048) for the relief of Rufus Betz;

A bill (H. R. 2143) granting a pension to Mrs. Emily M. Van Derveer, widow of the late Brig. Gen. Ferdinand Van Derveer;

A bill (H. R. 2944) granting a pension to Martha McNeil;

A bill (H. R. 3001) granting a pension to Cynthia A. Lapham, widow of William B. Lapham;

A bill (H. R. 4068) to enable the city of Tucson, in the Territory of Arizona, to issue bonds to construct a water and sewer system;

A bill (H. R. 4298) granting a pension to Annie Thompson;

A bill (H. R. 4787) to establish the port of Conneaut, in the State of Ohio, as a subport in the district of Cuyahoga, in the State of Ohio;

A bill (H. R. 7865) to allow the return free of duty of certain articles exported from the United States for exhibition purposes.

STOUT, HALL & BANGS.

Mr. ALLEN. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 1656) for the relief of Stout, Hall & Bangs.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to pay to W. H. B. Stout, Cyrus J. Hall, and Isaac S. Bangs $31,802.53, in full payment of the balance due them on a contract to furnish stone for the walls of the cellar or subbasement of the Library building in the city of Washington.

Mr. ALLEN. I will state to the Senate that I understand the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW] withdraws the amendment which he offered and withdraws all objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is withdrawn.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PROPOSED INVESTIGATION OF BOND SALES.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President—

Mr. GRAY. Will the Senator from New Hampshire yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. GRAY. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 1929) for the relief of William H. Crook.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. PEPPER. I insist upon the regular order. I ask that the unfinished business may be laid before the Senate.

Mr. GRAY. I hope the Senator from Kansas will allow the bill for which consideration has already been asked to be passed.

Mr. PEPPER. I will yield after the unfinished business is laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator withdraw his request?

Mr. PEPPER. I ask that the unfinished business may be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It was before the Senate, and was laid aside temporarily.

Mr. PEPPER. That is true—for the appropriation bill. But the appropriation bill having been passed, I ask that it may now be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A resolution by Mr. PEPPER, providing for a committee of five Senators to investigate and report generally all the material facts and circumstances connected with the sale of United States bonds by the Secretary of the Treasury in the years 1894, 1895, and 1896.

Mr. GRAY. I ask the Senator from Kansas to yield to me.

Mr. PEPPER. I yield temporarily.

WILLIAM H. CROOK.

Mr. GRAY. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 1929) for the relief of William H. Crook.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, in line 6, before the word "thousand," to strike out "six" and insert "four"; so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to William H. Crook, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $4,000, as compensation for services as secretary to the President to sign land patents for the fiscal years of 1879, 1880, 1881 and 1882, inclusive, and which services were additional to his regular duties as executive clerk and disbursing agent, the amount being the same as was formerly paid for such service.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM A. BECKFORD.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent—

Mr. PEPPER. I have not yielded the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas insist on proceeding with the unfinished business?

Mr. PEPPER. The Senator from New Hampshire has not asked me to yield. At least I did not so understand him.

Mr. GALLINGER. I addressed the Chair and was recognized, and then I yielded to the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY].

Mr. PEPPER. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. I appreciate the Senator's courtesy. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2594) granting an increase of pension to William A. Beckford.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to pension William A. Beckford, late first lieutenant of Company F, Eighth Regiment New Hampshire Volunteer Infantry, at the rate of $50 per month in lieu of the pension he is now receiving.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ECKINGTON AND BELT LINE RAILWAYS.

Mr. GORMAN. I ask the Senate to consider Senate bill 2928, in relation to an extension of the routes of the Eckington and Soldiers' Home Railway Company and of the Belt Railway Company. The bill has been reported favorably by the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. PEPPER. I insist upon my right to the floor. I will yield to the Senator from Maryland, however, for the purpose of considering the bill he has indicated. Perhaps the Senator is not aware that the bond resolution is now before the Senate, and I have been yielding the floor to several Senators. I yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. GORMAN. I am very much indebted to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. HILL. The courtesy must be equal, of course. I hardly think the Senator from Kansas expects to take up the unfinished business at 4 o'clock on Saturday afternoon. It can not be finished to-day. In fact, I do not wish to have my argument cut off. Others desire to speak, and I suggest to the Senator from Kansas that the resolution go over and take its place on Monday, and then if the Senate wishes to go on with it I shall be ready to proceed.

Mr. PEPPER. I would not oppose a motion to adjourn.

Mr. HILL. I would make a motion to adjourn, except that I do not wish to be discourteous to Senators as to routine business, which might be proceeded with and disposed of.

Mr. GORMAN. I suggest that the bond resolution shall be laid before the Senate before we adjourn, so as to leave it the unfinished business, and that will serve the purpose.

Mr. PUGH. It has already been laid before the Senate.

Mr. GORMAN. With that understanding, I shall ask that the bill I have indicated may be considered.

Mr. PEPPER. Very well.

Mr. GORMAN. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 2928) to extend the routes of the Eckington and Soldiers' Home Railway Company and of the Belt Railway Company of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN M'CARTHY.

Mr. WILSON. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 2324) to relieve John McCarthy from the charge of desertion.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs with an amendment, in line 6, to strike out the word "desertion" and insert "having deserted from the service August 6, 1865"; so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the charge of desertion now appearing against John McCarthy, formerly of the United States Navy, is hereby removed, and the said John McCarthy be, and he is hereby, relieved from the charge of having deserted from the service August 6, 1865, and that he be, and he is hereby, restored to all the rights to which he would have been entitled had no charge of desertion been entered against him and had no record showing desertion been made.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

IRWIN TUCKER.

Mr. MARTIN. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (S. 1082) for the relief of Irwin Tucker, postmaster at Newport News, Va.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Auditor for the Post-Office Department to credit the account of Irwin Tucker, postmaster at Newport News, Va., with $4,290.80 for postage stamps and with $83.03 for money-order funds stolen from his office February 8, 1894.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SALE OF GAS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. McMILLAN. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (H. R. 6994) relating to the sale of gas in the District of Columbia.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 1, line 8, after the word "dollar," to insert "and fifteen cents"; and after the word "feet," in the same line, to insert:

Until July 1, 1898: at a rate not exceeding $1.10 per thousand cubic feet from July 1, 1898, until July 1, 1900: at a rate not exceeding $1.05 per thousand cubic feet from July 1, 1900, until July 1, 1901, after which last-named date the rate shall not exceed $1 per thousand cubic feet;

So as to make the section read:

That the Washington Gas Light Company of the District of Columbia is authorized to charge and collect, after the passage of this act, for illuminating gas furnished to and paid for by the Government of the United States, and other consumers in the District of Columbia, at the rate of not exceeding $1.15 per thousand cubic feet until July 1, 1898; at a rate not exceeding $1.10 per thousand cubic feet from July 1, 1898, until July 1, 1900; at a rate not exceeding $1.05 per thousand cubic feet from July 1, 1900, until July 1, 1901, after which last-named date the rate shall not exceed $1 per thousand cubic feet: Provided, That if consumers other than the Government shall not pay monthly any gas bill within ten days after the same shall have been presented, said company may charge and collect from said consumer so failing to pay said bill as aforesaid $1.25 per thousand cubic feet for the gas furnished to said consumer during said month.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, after the word "and," in line 13, to strike out the words "twenty-five" and insert "forty"; and in line 16, after the word "feet," to insert:

Until July 1, 1898: at a rate not exceeding $1.35 per thousand cubic feet from July 1, 1898, until July 1, 1900; at a rate not exceeding $1.30 per thousand cubic feet from July 1, 1900, until July 1, 1901, after which last-named date the rate shall not exceed $1.25 per thousand cubic feet;

So as to make the section read:

Sec. 2. That the Georgetown Gas Light Company, doing business in that part of the District of Columbia formerly known as Georgetown, is authorized to charge and collect, after passage of this act, for illuminating gas furnished to, and paid for, by the Government of the United States, and other consumers in that part of the District of Columbia, at the rate of not exceeding $1.40 per thousand cubic feet until July 1, 1898; at a rate not exceeding $1.35 per thousand cubic feet from July 1, 1898, until July 1, 1900; at a rate not exceeding $1.30 per thousand cubic feet from July 1, 1900, until July 1, 1901, after which last-named date the rate shall not exceed $1.25 per thousand cubic feet: Provided, That if consumers, other than the Government, shall not pay monthly any gas bill within ten days after the same shall have been presented, said company may charge and collect from said consumer so failing to pay said bill as aforesaid $1.50 per thousand cubic feet for the gas furnished said consumer during said month.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, line 12, after the word "equal," to strike out "twenty-two" and insert "twenty-four," and in line 13, after the words "using the," to strike out "English parliamentary standard Argand burner having 15 holes and a 7-inch chimney" and insert "Bray slit union burner No. 7"; so as to read:

That section 1 of an act entitled "An act regulating gas works," approved June 23, 1874, is amended so as to read as follows: "That from and after the 30th day of June, 1874, the illuminating power of the gas furnished by any gaslight company, person, or persons in the District of Columbia shall be equal to 24 candles by the Bunsen photometer, using the Bray slit union burner No. 7, consuming 5 cubic feet of gas per hour.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as an additional section the following:

SEC. 5. That neither the Washington Gas Light Company nor the Georgetown Gas Light Company shall hereafter issue any greater number of shares of stock than shall be equal to the actual and necessary cost of the construction of future extensions or future enlargement of plant, which cost shall first be ascertained and authorized upon petition therefor to the supreme court of the District of Columbia, under such regulations as the chief justice and the justices thereof shall prescribe; also, if either of the said corporations shall desire hereafter to issue bonds upon their property, secured by mortgage or otherwise, upon petition therefor to said court, setting forth the necessity thereof and the amount of stock issued and outstanding, it may and shall be lawful for said court, or the chief justice and justices thereof, as the case may be, or one of them, upon public notice, to be prescribed by the rules of said court, to permit the issuance of such bonds and mortgage as desired: Provided, that the amount of stock and bonds so issued shall not exceed the actual cost of such extensions or enlargement of plant: And provided further, That the Washington Gas Light Company is hereby authorized to issue such additional amount of capital stock as will provide for the conversion into such stock of its outstanding certificates of indebtedness, which conversion is hereby authorized to an amount not exceeding $900,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add as a new section the following:

SEC. 6. That the officers of the United States having in charge the lighting of the public buildings situated in the District of Columbia and the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized, in their discretion, to enter into contracts with the Washington Gas Light Company or the Georgetown Gas Light Company for Government or public lighting, as the case may be, for a period not to exceed five years, at such rates as they may deem for the public interest, but not in any case exceeding the rates named in this act: Provided, That nothing in this section shall be construed to restrict the substitution of electric lighting for gas, either in public buildings or public streets.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add as a new section the following:

SEC. 7. That Congress reserves the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLEN. I want to call the attention of the Senator from Michigan to the bill for a moment. I observe in one section of the bill a provision that the company may mortgage their plant upon obtaining a ruling from the supreme court of the District.

Mr. McMILLAN. That is to enable the company to increase their capital stock when their plant is increased.

Mr. ALLEN. It uses the language "the chief justice and justices thereof, as the case may be, or one of them." I suggest to the Senator the propriety of striking out the words "or one of them," in line 13, of section 5, so that the entire court shall pass upon it.

Mr. McMILLAN. I have no objection to that.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CALL. I think that this bill ought not to pass without mature consideration. As I heard it read, it is one of the very worst forms of monopoly that could be created. For a long time the gas supply of this city and the conditions with which it has been surrounded have been regarded by the people of this city and throughout the United States as a most iniquitous condition of things; and this bill continues this monopoly until 1901, impliedly, if not directly. I have no objection to any company making a reasonable profit; but for years it has been contended here, and reported upon by different committees, that there is a most outrageous condition of things in reference to the enormous profits which have been made by this gas company. Now, in common fairness to the people, when it has been reported here time and again that gas can be supplied and will be supplied by companies petitioning for the opportunity at one-half the cost proposed, for this body silently to permit this monopoly to be fixed without any inquiry whatever, with the right to take from the people of this District double the price for which other persons are anxious to supply gas—without inquiry, without evidence, without any discussion, that this condition of things may be continued seems to me not creditable to this body.

I can not speak with any certainty of the facts in regard to this case, but it is the universal opinion of business men and of persons who have investigated the condition of this gas company, and we read it in the public journals, that in some places gas of a superior quality and of greater illuminating power is furnished at 75 cents a thousand feet.

Then, again, this bill provides that if a poor person shall fail to pay his gas bill within a certain time the price of gas shall be increased 25, 30, or 40 per cent. Why should not this enormously rich company be content with the ordinary means of obtaining what is due to it? Again, I am told that a poor person here is required to pay $5 for a deposit, notwithstanding this company have made, I understand, four, five, and six times the original cost of their plant and every year receive nearly as much as the entire money they have put into the concern. We know that the stock of the gas company is held here by a few enormously rich men, who have grown rich by plundering the poor people of this District in excessive and enormous charges.

If these things are not true, let them be disproved; but do not let us pass a bill of this description, with the most odious form of monopoly that can possibly be conceived of, and fasten it upon these people, without a single word of discussion.

Mr. PROCTOR. I do not understand that the Senator from Florida objects to the consideration of the bill. I wish to say that I sympathize strongly with his view. I was one of the committee who did everything in my power to get dollar gas, but I believed, as we could not get everything we desired, in accepting the best we could get. This was a compromise; and I think, under all the circumstances, a very fair one. It will give dollar gas after five years and makes an early reduction.

I think, on the whole, the purpose the Senator has at heart will be better accomplished by passing this bill than in any other possible way. I fear if the bill is not agreed to by the Senate we may fail to get any reduction. This is a step in the right direction, and I think the Senator, if he understood the case fully as it came before the committee, would be satisfied with the results that we reached.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I desire to say, as one of the committee, that I fully agree with what the distinguished Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR] has just said. I was also one of those who desired to make a more radical reduction than that proposed by the committee; but, as has been stated by the Senator from Vermont as to himself, I finally agreed to the bill in its present shape, because I thought it was better to do that than to jeopardize the getting of any reduction at all.

There is a gradual descending scale; there is a material reduction immediately; and while I should be very glad if the reduction could have been greater, I felt that I was serving the interests of the people of this District in giving my assent to the bill as it has been reported, rather than jeopardize the passage of any bill whatever.

Mr. GEORGE. What was the difficulty in adjusting the rate as the Senator from Georgia thinks it ought to be adjusted? Was the difficulty with the company?

Mr. BACON. No, sir; not with the company, but there was a difference among Senators as to what was proper.

Mr. GEORGE. Not the committee?

Mr. BACON. Not the committee. There were a few members of the committee who wanted the price fixed at $1.25.

Mr. GEORGE. There was no dispute as to the power of Congress to fix the rate?

Mr. BACON. Undoubtedly Congress has that power. There was no trouble upon that subject. The sole difficulty grew out of the fact that there was a division among the members as to what was the proper rate.

I will state to the Senator from Mississippi that this conclusion was not reached simply by haphazard. Senators have gone carefully through the figures and made calculations as to what was a fair profit, and while they differed, it was thought best that there should be some common ground upon which they could agree, and this is the result.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator from Florida complained of the very excessive charge made for delay in the payment of gas bills.

Mr. BACON. I am not exact in my recollection as to what it is, but in this case, as is not unusual in gas companies—I know it is so in other communities, and not only in gas companies, but telephone and other companies—a certain rate is allowed to persons who pay their bills promptly, and those who do not pay promptly are required to pay a higher rate. I do not remember exactly what that matter of detail is. I will state that the matter of detail was not carefully considered by me.

Mr. McMILLAN. I will state, in answer to what has been said on that question, that this is the rule in every city. There is always a rebate for the prompt payment of gas bills.

Mr. GEORGE. What is the charge here for delay in payment?

Mr. McMILLAN. At present it is 25 cents—about 20 per cent. Under this bill it will be but 10 cents on a thousand feet at first.

Mr. GEORGE. For how long a delay?

Mr. McMILLAN. Ten days.

Mr. GEORGE. Twenty per cent, then, for ten days' delay?

Mr. McMILLAN. There are less than 3 per cent of the people in the entire District of Columbia who do not pay promptly.

Mr. GALLINGER. A single observation, Mr. President, on this question. I started out very firmly convinced that we ought to have dollar gas in the District of Columbia. I will confess, however, that I knew nothing whatever of the subject except what I had read in newspapers and learned from public clamor. The Committee on the District of Columbia, of which I am a member, gave days and days to the consideration of this question, hearing everybody who pretended to be interested in it or who had a grievance. The result was that it was demonstrated to our entire satisfaction that the cost of some of the ingredients of gas, coal particularly, which enters into the manufacture of gas, was higher in this city than in the Northern cities, and that a less amount was received for the so-called residuum in this city than is received in other cities of the country.

The company demonstrated further that for the next three years they had entered into contracts whereby they are to pay a very much larger amount for certain important ingredients which are used in the manufacture of gas than they had been paying in the past. They furnish gas for $1.25 a thousand feet in the District of Columbia.

Beyond doubt the company has made very large profits, or what might be considered large profits, but those profits have not been anywhere nearly so excessive as is represented by parties who know nothing about the subject. We believed, after examining all the facts and figures that we could get access to, that it would be disastrous to the interests of the stockholders if we made an immediate reduction to $1 per thousand feet. The result was that our judgment was—and it was the combined judgment of the committee, two or three members yielding convictions that they held a little more tenaciously than I did mine—that if we reduced for two years the price of gas from $1.25 to $1.15, taking some $80,000 from the revenues of the company, reducing it still further for the next two years to $1.05, and then to $1, it would be as far as we ought to go and do justice to the stockholders of this corporation, which has invested some $4,000,000 in a gas plant in the city of Washington. There was no difference of opinion finally in the committee; and I do not think that any Senator offhand can rise up and say that he knows more about this matter than the 13 members of the Committee on the District of Columbia, who have given, as I said a moment ago, days and days of their valuable time to the consideration of this great subject. I think we have done justice to the citizens of the District of Columbia. We have tried to do equal and exact justice to the men who have their money invested in this enterprise, and I trust the bill will pass without further objection.

Mr. CALL. I ask the Senator from New Hampshire if he will state what profits have been made by this company? What was the amount of money originally actually paid into the company?

Mr. GALLINGER. I am sorry to say to the Senator from Florida that I am unable to do that. I will say to the Senator that beyond a doubt some twenty years ago, or thereabout, this company made enormous profits; there is no doubt about that; but the stock is now held to a very large extent by other parties than those who held it at that time. The committee were of opinion that that old argument which had been used against this corporation and has been repeated and reiterated over and over again, that they made very large profits at some time in the past, ought not to be urged against the present stockholders, and that their investments ought not to be jeopardized because of that fact.

My judgment is that the company last year, receiving $1.25 per thousand for their gas, were able to pay 10 per cent on their capital. I would say that their capital stock is $2,000,000, and they having $4,000,000 invested, it would be 5 per cent on the amount invested. They had a very respectable balance sheet, the exact amount of which I can not state, but by the bill which is now under consideration we propose to take $80,000 from their balance sheet for the next year, which we thought was all that we could be reasonably expected to do.

I regret that the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER] is not here. He has made a very careful computation of the expenditures and receipts of this gas company, and was very largely instrumental in converting me as a member of that committee to the views he held, that we should be doing gross injustice to the stockholders of this company if we reduced gas at this time to a lower rate than $1.15 a thousand.

Mr. McMILLAN. I would say to the Senator from Florida that the trouble is that the original stockholders, or most of them, have passed away. The present stockholders have paid a very large price for their stock in the open market.

Mr. CALL. Will the Senator please repeat his statement?

Mr. McMILLAN. I say the present stockholders are principally persons who have purchased stock in the market at high rates, and the rate of interest the present stockholders get with gas at $1.25 a thousand is about 6 or 7 per cent. Of course the original stockholders make more.

Mr. CALL. Will the Senator state how many stockholders there are at this time and how many of the original stockholders now hold stock?

Mr. McMILLAN. The number of present stockholders would run into the hundreds, as I am informed. Some six or seven hundred of the stockholders are residents of Washington.

Mr. CALL. What proportion of the original stockholders still remain?

Mr. McMILLAN. I can not answer that question; but I will say that most of them died or sold their holdings.

Mr. GALLINGER. They are practically all dead, I will say to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. CALL. Will either of the Senators state what amount of money the company's plant can be duplicated for?

Mr. McMILLAN. The present plant could not be duplicated for less than $4,000,000, possibly $5,000,000.

Mr. CALL. Does the Senator state that as a fact?

Mr. McMILLAN. I state it as a fact. That is my opinion, based on experience, and I have had a good deal of experience in such matters.

Mr. CALL. I should like to know of what the great cost of the gas plant consists? The city furnishes the streets and there is nothing but excavations which have been made. What is it for which it is necessary to expend $4,000,000 by the company which supplies gas to this city?

Mr. McMILLAN. This is a very large city and requires a great many retorts. A great deal of real estate is required, an enormous quantity of piping, and betterments, for which money is continually being expended here in carrying on the gas business. I have not any question in my own mind that if any one were to try to duplicate all the property in the possession of the gas company to-day it would require at least $4,000,000 to do it. I have not any doubt about that.

Mr. CALL. What are the gross receipts of the company?

Mr. McMILLAN. About $1,100,000.

Mr. CALL. One million one hundred thousand dollars on an investment of $4,000,000.

Mr. GALLINGER. That represents the gross receipts.

Mr. McMILLAN. Certainly, that represents the gross receipts.

Mr. CALL. I understand that.

Mr. McMILLAN. Of course the cost of distributing gas, which is very expensive, must be deducted, and the price of coal, which is nearly double what it is in my city of Detroit. Coal costs more here than it does in most cities; for example, Cleveland, Buffalo, Chicago, or even Boston.

Mr. CALL. It seems, then, that everything in the District of Columbia is a subject of some kind of monopoly, which increases its cost beyond what it is elsewhere.

Mr. McMILLAN. The cost of labor, too, is very much greater here.

Mr. CALL. Then the committee ought to report some kind of legislation which would remedy that state of things.

I am informed, however, upon that point, that it is the opinion here that this gas plant can be duplicated for one-third of this amount, and that there are companies proposing to furnish gas, and to give bond and guarantee that they will do so to any extent which is demanded by Congress, for one-half the amount specified in this bill. I do not know that to be true, or that these companies are responsible, but I do know that if there be any particle of truth in the statement the opportunity should be offered to the people here to have their gas supplied at one-half the cost provided for in the bill. We ought to know before passing this bill whether or not these statements are untrue, and that the opinions of Senators who have spoken are well founded.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say to the Senator from Florida that the committee has very diligently investigated that phase of the question, giving a great many hours to the advocates of so-called cheap gas, and the committee were unanimously of opinion that it could not be done.

Mr. CALL. Is it true that a company has offered to furnish gas, if the opportunity is allowed, for greatly less than the rates provided in this bill?

Mr. GALLINGER. That is on the face of it true, but the committee gave very careful consideration to that matter, and they were guided to a considerable extent by the fate of competing gas companies in other cities of this country, where they in almost every instance have been absorbed by the existing gas companies, and have simply added to the burdens of the people.

Furthermore, the very gentlemen who advocated cheap gas before the committee had their arguments absolutely refuted by a gentleman who is at the head of the only large gas company which is operating under their system, who says that the cost of gas is very much larger as a matter of fact than it is under the system which is used in this and most other cities.

Mr. HAWLEY. Can the Senator from Michigan tell us how many miles of service pipe there are in this city?

Mr. McMILLAN. Nearly 400.

Mr. HAWLEY. Then 400 miles of street would have to be torn up by a new company. I had rather pay more for gas than have that done.

Mr. GALLINGER. And simply for experimental purposes, too.

Mr. McMILLAN. I will say to the Senator from Florida that this is an intelligent effort to reduce the price of gas in the District of Columbia. We have examined this question very thoroughly and carefully, and we believe the bill the best possible solution of existing difficulties. The District Committee think we ought not to go to dollar gas at once, but that we ought to make the reduction gradually. The bill will give the people of the District of Columbia cheaper gas immediately and bring the price down to a dollar in five years. There are comparatively few cities in this whole country which have dollar gas. In New York and in most cities the price is $1.25; and in others it is $1.50. We are trying to reduce it to $1 here; and if the Senator succeeds in defeating this bill by objecting, he simply makes the people here pay $1.25 per thousand feet for gas.

Mr. CALL. There is another provision of the bill to which I call attention, for which I have heard no kind of justification. The bill makes the poor man, who is unable to pay his bill promptly, pay $1.30, I believe it is, for his gas, and the man who is able to pay and has money lying by him has to pay a third less.

Mr. GALLINGER. Does the Senator from Florida know of a single gas company in the world which does not have a provision of this kind which they can enforce?

Mr. CALL. I am happy to state that the American people ought not to be bound by the monopolies which have robbed and plundered the poor people of the world. We are here to protect the people; we are here to make this District the model government, in which the poor man equally with the rich man shall have all the comforts of life at his command; and I believe that it is in the power of legislation to do it. I do not think it is our policy to encourage monopoly; and, if we do permit it, it ought to be bound down by the strongest chains to what is reasonable.

I am willing to see men compensated for the use of their money in public franchises, but I insist upon it that they shall be restrained and limited, and if there be an opportunity offered to the Congress of the United States by responsible parties who are willing to furnish bond and security to supply gas for a less amount largely than the amount named in this bill, I think it should be accepted; and if it be necessary that there should be other legislation, why not enact it? If the Government can furnish gas at one-half the price, why not do it? If the railroad corporations of this country are demanding excessive and extortionate charges for the transportation of coal, why should not this Congress prohibit it and impose reasonable rates upon them? What is the difficulty about it, I should like to know? You say money should have reasonable compensation. Admit it. My friend laughs, but the people whose homes are suffering do not laugh. They have not the comforts of life, and they feel the hard hand of oppression. If these ideas are not true, disprove them. If an unreasonable price is charged for coal, come forward here and correct it. This is the arena for discussion. Let us have the proof upon this subject.

The Senator from New Hampshire says that some company has offered to furnish gas and offered to furnish security, and yet it is said that in the past the old monopolies have been able to defeat these efforts to cheapen the gas furnished to the people of the country, and that the new companies have been absorbed by the larger concerns. Can not we prohibit that? For what is free government except to protect the people?

Mr. President, it seems to me that this bill ought to have very careful consideration before we provide that after 1900 an absolute monopoly shall have the right to charge a fixed price for gas. I do not think that this bill ought to pass in the present conditions.

Mr. GEORGE. I was rather struck with the argument which was made in opposition to the views of the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL]. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] stated that in the past there had been enormous profits made by this gas company. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. McMILLAN] stated that the present stockholders, or a large number of them, have given a very high premium for the stock, that they have paid out a large sum of money for their stock, and that they ought to receive a fair interest on this large increase in the value of the stock. So the argument reduces itself down to this, that the company heretofore has been allowed to increase the value of its stock by extortionate charges upon the public; and now, when we are undertaking to regulate it, we are estopped from doing it because after they had made these large profits they had sold the stock to other people, and it would be unjust to make the present holders take less interest than they think they ought to get. That is about the situation; and I do not think that is a fair argument against the position taken by the Senator from Florida.

Mr. CALL. I think this bill had better go over until the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER] comes here, who, it is said, knows all about it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being made, the bill will go over.

REPUBLICAN FORM OF GOVERNMENT IN ALABAMA.

Mr. CHANDLER. I desire to have the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 445, being resolution 54, proposing an inquiry concerning the election in Alabama in 1894.

Mr. PUGH. What do I understand to be the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. CHANDLER. I made no motion, I will say to the Senator from Alabama. I said that I desired at this time to proceed to the consideration of the resolution I indicated. Does the Senator rise to object?

Mr. PUGH. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY], who is the senior member representing the minority of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, which opposed the report of that resolution to the Senate, is not now present.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senator will allow me a word, that is true. The Senator from Delaware is doubtless called away by the pressure of private or public business.

But I call the Senator's attention to the fact that this resolution was reported on the 3d of March with an amendment, and the minority were authorized to submit their views. The majority gave their reasons why the resolution ought to be adopted. It is a resolution of inquiry introduced, I think, in December by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN], who is here opposite me. The reasons given by the majority were reported March 10, 1896. It is now the 25th of April, and the minority have not yet submitted their views. We have waited for them patiently.

If the resolution is not to be proceeded with at this time I certainly desire to submit a few remarks, and so does the Senator from Nebraska, in reference to the facts which are the bases of the proposed inquiry. I do not like to go on in the absence of the Senator from Delaware. I do not like to go on in the absence of the colleague of the Senator from Alabama, whose title to his seat is in some degree impugned by the facts which are stated in the majority report and stated in the speech made here more than a year ago by the Senator from Nebraska, and will be impugned by the facts which I shall state.

But I ask the Senator from Alabama when there will be an opportunity to state these facts and to discuss this question? There is no minority report. We have waited more than a month for that. We ask to take it up. The Senator from Delaware is absent. It is manifest that if things go on in this way we shall be as little likely to pass the resolution as we are to pass the resolution to investigate the sale of bonds as long as the Senator from New York chooses to discuss that resolution.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire if he has any information as to when the minority report will be filed.

Mr. CHANDLER. I am obliged to say I have not. Perhaps the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH] can tell us. I have inquired for it two or three times.

Mr. ALLEN. Has the Senator called the attention of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] to the matter?

Mr. CHANDLER. Several times, and the Senator from Delaware has had good excuses, it seemed to me, personally. Perhaps the Senator from Alabama can tell us why we have not the report.

Mr. PUGH. It is true that the majority report was made at the time stated by the Senator and we have had sufficient time to present the views of the minority. But the cause of the delay ought to be well known to the Senator. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY], who had charge of the preparation of the minority report, has been engaged pretty much the whole time in listening to the protracted arguments upon the right of Mr. Du Pont to a seat in the Senate. Pretty much all of the time that he had to prepare the minority report has been taken up by the duty imposed on him to hear the argument and participate in the argument on the right of the claimant from Delaware as a Senator from his own State to a seat in this body.

I am sorry the Senator from Delaware is not present to make his own statement as to what engagements he has had that have interfered in preventing him from preparing the minority report. But I happen to know that he could not undertake to prepare it without submitting it not only to those who join with him in making the minority report, but also to my colleague, who is perfectly familiar with all the facts, more so than any other Senator, and the right to whose seat is involved in the proposed investigation. One of the predicates of the power claimed by the Senate to make the investigation is that it strikes at the right of my colleague to the seat he now occupies in the Senate founded on the election in August, 1894, at which the legislature was elected that sent him to this body.

I am unable to state with my knowledge of the condition of my colleague what time he would be in a condition to give attention to the preparation or examination of the minority report. I know that the very day this skeleton was sent to him for examination and to make such additions to it as he thought proper he was taken with severe illness, and he was confined to his room or his bed until a few days ago, when he was able to leave town. He is now absent in Pennsylvania, seeking the rest that is indispensable to restore him so that he can engage in his duties in this body. I am very much in hopes that he will be in a condition to give attention to the minority report in the course of the next week.

We have no disposition at all to delay action on this resolution, and while I am unable to state to the Senator what particular day we shall be ready to submit the minority report, I think I can undertake to say that we will have it ready in the course of the next week. I will correspond with my colleague and learn whether he is in a condition to give it attention, and if he is, as soon as it is received from him it will be presented, and when it is printed I see no objection to calling up and considering the resolution.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I wish to show all possible consideration to the Senator from Alabama who is absent sick. I am willing to make such disposition of this subject for the time being as may be satisfactory to the Senator from Nebraska, whose resolution it is. I desire at the earliest possible day to make some statements to the Senate in reference to the facts which are to be the basis of the investigation, if one is made by order of the Senate. I shall not take more than fifteen or twenty minutes. I shall be very glad to go on at this time if there is no objection. If not, I shall certainly desire to do so at an early day.

Mr. VEST. As it seems very evident that this case can not be determined this afternoon, I ask the Senator from New Hampshire to yield to me that I may call up an unobjected bill.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator from Missouri yield to me just a moment?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. ALLEN. It is due to myself that I should state the attitude I occupy to this resolution. I have been trying now for almost a year and a half to have it taken up and adopted by the Senate; and I have been at all times ready to take it up. The organization of the Senate now being in the hands of the Republican party, and they being within one of a majority, I have felt and still feel that the country will hold them responsible for a failure to take up and pass the resolution promptly. I may supplement that, however, with the statement that if the Republican party gives its 44 votes in this Chamber in favor of the resolution there will be no doubt about its passage.

Mr. CHANDLER. When does the Senator think we can get an opportunity to vote on it? That seems to be the point now. If he will expedite his political—I will not say associates, the Senators with whom he occasionally associates politically, oftener than he does with the Senators upon this side of the Chamber—if he will expedite them we will have a vote upon the resolution and can undoubtedly adopt it.

Mr. ALLEN. I do not know. I am afraid the resolution would not find much sympathy on this side of the Chamber. I feel as though the Republican party has declared itself repeatedly in favor of a fair ballot and an honest count, and that if it fails now, with a majority in this Chamber—

Mr. FRYE. No.

Mr. ALLEN. It has a majority upon this resolution. It has within one of a majority, and I, as a Populist, will make the forty-fifth man in favor of it. Therefore you have the majority. If the Republican party under those circumstances fails to take up and pass the resolution, as it has the power to do and has the time within which to do it, I shall feel that the country will simply construe its claim to preeminent purity in this respect as something of a mere claim, and that when the opportunity is presented to it it fails to avail itself of it.

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not think the Senator attributes any dilatoriness to me.

Mr. ALLEN. Not at all.

Mr. CHANDLER. We have been unfortunate in the fact that the Senator from Alabama whose seat is affected has been sick and is absent.

Mr. ALLEN. I feel that the Senator from New Hampshire has done all he could. I regret very much that the Senator from Alabama is sick and that there has necessarily been some delay in consequence. I hope, however, that the Senator from Delaware will get the minority report on file. I understand that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] is in Pennsylvania, and can be reached by a few hours' travel. I trust the minority report may be submitted to him and he agree to it, or suggest such amendments as he sees fit, and that it will be filed promptly, and the resolution can be taken up and passed before Congress adjourns.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will add but a word and then I will yield to the Senator from Missouri, if he desires to have a bill passed. I will submit on Monday morning a supplemental report containing the additional facts which I should like to state to the Senate in my remarks, so that the minority of the committee—who have been more than a month with the majority report before them without answering it—may also answer the supplemental facts in their minority report. After the minority report is printed I hope the Senator from Alabama will agree that we ought to have a day fixed for the discussion of the resolution, and we ought to have a vote upon the question whether there shall be an inquiry.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to ask the Senator from Alabama if he can approximate the time when the minority report will be filed and when the Senator from Alabama will himself be willing to take the resolution up for discussion and consideration?

Mr. PUGH. I have stated that I am unable to mention what time my colleague will be in a condition to give attention to the preparation of the minority report. I apprehend that the Senator from Delaware would not be willing to submit a minority report without giving my colleague an opportunity to examine it and make such additions or changes in it as he might think proper with his superior knowledge of the facts. The Senator can tell as well as I can what time my colleague will be in a condition to give attention to business. I hope that he will recover rapidly enough to be in a condition to devote some time to the preparation of the minority report, or at least to examine the report that will be submitted to him by the Senator from Delaware.

There has not been an hour's intentional delay in the preparation of the minority report. The circumstances preventing its preparation we had no agency whatever in producing. It was the sickness of my colleague and the unavoidable duties of the Senator from Delaware. In the absence of my colleague and knowing the engagements of the Senator from Delaware, a skeleton report, imperfect in its thoroughness, has been presented and is now in the hands of my colleague. My belief is that with very little labor, when he is in condition to work at all, he will be able to make such additions to what he has in hand as to satisfy himself with the minority report, and it can be returned and presented to the Senate by the Senator from Delaware.

In my relations to this case, being a Senator from the State and a colleague of the Senator whose right to a seat is involved in this investigation, I am embarrassed in undertaking to assume any charge, or control, or management of this attempt to ask the authority of the Senate for making the investigation.

The first ground upon which the power is asked to be exercised by the Senate is that Alabama has no republican government, and the object of the inquiry is to ascertain facts upon which that conclusion is to be reached by the Senate. The trial is to be made by the Senate whether, upon the facts discovered by this committee, Alabama has a republican form of government.

The next ground upon which the power of the Senate is invoked to order the investigation is the denial of the right of my colleague to the seat that he has obtained from the legislature of Alabama. I undertake to say it is a mere statement that perhaps will amount to nothing, but I am satisfied that when the facts in the minority report are presented to the Senate it will be the most remarkable event in its history if 44 Senators are found here to vote to order that investigation. There is no event in the history of the Senate that would compare with the one that would happen if that investigation were ordered upon the facts which will be presented upon the record—indisputable facts presented upon the record in that minority report.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator from Alabama object to stating briefly what those facts will be?

Mr. PUGH. I do object, because they will be presented in the minority report in due time.

Mr. ALLEN. I realize the situation the Senator is in. I hope, however, that there will not be manifested any purpose to further delay the filing of the minority report; that it may be filed at an early day next week, and the resolution taken up for consideration.

ROBERT M'GEE.

Mr. VEST. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 229) for the relief of Robert McGee.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to investigate the claim of Robert McGee, to be paid out of interest money due to the Sioux Nation of Indians from the Government of the United States, $10,000, in compensation for damages sustained by him by reason of having been scalped and otherwise injured by the Brulé Sioux Indians while serving as a teamster with a train conveying Government supplies to Fort Union, N. Mex., July 18, 1864.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, April 25, 1896.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

The Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, delivered the following prayer:

Our Father who art in Heaven, we thank Thee for those tender ties which bind us together as families, and for those ties of friendship which tend to widen the circle of fraternity and teach us that all the world are akin. Help us to-day, O Lord, as we call to mind the character of one who lately occupied a seat among us, that we may be able to throw the sweet veil of charity over all his faults and magnify his virtues; and help us that we may emulate those virtues, so that when we are called upon to pass from this life we, too, shall have the eulogy of our friends. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I present a conference report on the legislative appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report of the committee of conference.

The Clerk proceeded to read the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. BINGHAM (interrupting the reading). Mr. Speaker, unless some gentleman demands the reading of the details of the report, I am of opinion the statement will give to the House all the information required and expedite business.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the reading of the report in detail will be omitted. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will read the statement.

The report of the committee of conference is as follows:

HENRY H. BINGHAM,
JNO. E. MCCALL,
ALEXANDER M. DOCKERY,
Managers on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. BINGHAM. I do not know whether there is any desire on the part of the House to debate the agreements and disagreements of the report. If there are any inquiries to be made, I am ready to answer them.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if there is any legislation in regard to the capital of Oklahoma Territory?

Mr. BINGHAM. In what respect?

Mr. GROSVENOR. There is some money in one of these appropriation bills, appropriated for some purpose; and, in connection with that, I am informed that there has been put in by the Senate a limitation on the part of the Territorial legislature to legislate upon the subject of the capital of the Territory.

Mr. BINGHAM. I would say to the gentleman from Ohio that it is not in this conference, but was acted upon in the first conference by this committee, providing that the legislative assembly as to Oklahoma shall not consider any proposition or pass any bill to remove the seat of the government of said Territory from its present location. That was agreed upon by the first conference, and is therefore not before us in this conference.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Then it was agreed that a certain town should perpetually, until Statehood comes in, be established as the capital of the State, and putting it out of the power of the people of Oklahoma to have any voice in the matter of their capital.

Mr. BINGHAM. I again state to the gentleman from Ohio that that paragraph has already been agreed upon in the first conference.

Mr. GROSVENOR. It is a piece of legislation that ought to destroy any man that has been a party to it in the Territory. I have here a protest from a number of the largest towns of the Territory—a number of them—protesting against that legislation. I only voice that sentiment.

Mr. BINGHAM. I submit that this committee at this time has no authority over the subject.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Well, I want the responsibility to be fixed; that is all.

Mr. FLYNN. Mr. Speaker, I am responsible in a measure for the insertion of that provision in the bill. I desire to state that ever since Oklahoma was opened to settlement Congress has inserted, except in the first bill, a like provision. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE], now a member of this House, was the first governor of the Territory. Congress provided where the temporary seat of government should be. The legislative assembly met, and more disgraceful action never was known than that which was taken by that legislature concerning the capital location. Since that time most of the officials of the Territory, Democrats and Republicans alike, have appealed to Congress to remove the possibility of a repetition of that disgrace before the people of the Territory have the right to determine by ballot where they desire to have their capital located. In reply to the gentleman from Ohio, I want to say this: That perhaps were he not rankling with reference to other matters, he, with every fair-minded man in this House desirous of good government in the Territory of Oklahoma, would approve this provision, and he would not have made this onslaught here. If there is an official in the Territory who is not in favor of this provision now, he was in favor of it and recommended it to the last Congress by telegraph and by petition. The only reason now for dragging this matter in here is because, forsooth, I live in that town and am entering upon a campaign, and it is sought to have the people of the Territory think that perhaps by some underhand means I have succeeded in injecting this provision into the bill. The fact is, as I have stated, that it has been in every bill, except the first, since Oklahoma was organized. Let me say further that I was in the Territory at the time the present provision was put in the bill by the Senate, but I justify the action of the Senate. I justify the action of the House conferees in putting it in, and I think I voice the desire of our people. I say they have done well; they have done an act of justice to our people.

I am willing and desirous of our people being given an opportunity by their ballots to determine where the capital should be, and will support that kind of a proposition at all times.

Mr. GROSVENOR rose.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, while I am willing to yield for a moment, I wish to say that this is not now a matter in dispute. I desire, however, to be courteous to the gentleman.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Oh, you will not cut me off after my motives have been attacked.

Mr. BINGHAM. I have no desire to cut the gentleman off. I merely wish to call attention to the fact that this is not now a matter in controversy.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I simply wish to say that there is not anything "rankling" in me, and I do not know what the enormously distinguished gentleman means when he attacks me in that way.

Mr. FLYNN. What did the gentleman mean, then?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I happen to be the recipient of a large number of letters from respectable citizens of that Territory, one of which has just come to my desk, and I felt it to be my duty to call attention to the matter. That was all I proposed to do.

Mr. FLYNN. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will not. A man who attacks my motives and undertakes to cast reproach upon me in that way must take care of himself and not interrupt me. I have received a letter which I propose to read in part. It is but one of a series of letters which I have received from a number of people in that Territory. This letter is written from Oklahoma City, by a gentleman whom I vouch for as a highly respectable man, a lawyer. He does not authorize me to give his name, but I should not hesitate much to do that if necessary. He writes:

OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA., April 23, 1894.

Hon. C. H. GROSVENOR,

Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: There is a provision in the bill appropriating certain moneys for Oklahoma that is intended to prevent the Oklahoma legislature from taking any action relative to the removal of the capital from Guthrie. The bill is in the conference committee at this time, I understand.

While the people of this section may not desire to agitate that question, still such a clause is not doing justice to the other parts of the Territory. Oklahoma City has two railroads and is now the largest city in the Territory. It has the best accommodations for a capital, and before any legislature meets in this Territory there will be a third railroad in the city. Notwithstanding the protection of Congress in the way of each time preventing the legislature from taking any action upon the capital question, Guthrie is suffering from ennui, while this city is moving ahead.

I think it but just to all the balance of the Territory that the people shall have the right to say where this capital shall be.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Now, simply because I had been appealed to in the matter, I called the attention of the House to this provision in the bill, and I care nothing whatever about it—nothing whatever—and the bombastes furious process by which the gentleman has worked himself into this spontaneous effervescence here makes no impression upon me. [Laughter.] I repeat, I care nothing about this matter.

Mr. FLYNN. What brought me out was the statement of the gentleman that whoever had anything to do with this ought to be "destroyed." I am willing to let my people destroy me, but not the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I regard it as due to the House, before calling the previous question, to make a brief statement. Among the most serious and complicated propositions your committee had to consider were the many paragraphs with reference to the compensation of United States marshals and district attorneys, the change from the fee system to the fixed salary or compensation. The Judiciary Committee of the House rendered valuable services to the House in connection with the discussion, as did also the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, in the several Chambers. We had these gentlemen in conference with us throughout our conferences, and they rendered more than valuable service, and this House is under very great obligations to them.

The Senate amended the House bill with reference to the district attorneys, increasing it $68,500. We were able, with the aid of the gentlemen of the Judiciary Committee, both of the House and of the Senate, to reduce that to $43,000, so that the House allowance of salaries was increased only $23,000.

With reference to the marshals, the Senate increased the House allowance $71,500, and we were able to reduce that, so that the increase is only $4,500. [Applause.] There are between the two Houses to-day for the next conference only $16,020 for contention other than the $67,000 increase of the subordinate force of the Senate. So that this conference report amounts almost to a conclusion of the bill.

The Senate made a net increase in the amount appropriated by the bill of..... $247,029.20

From which sum, by the terms of the conference reports—

The Senate recedes from..... 103,920.00

Marshals:
Increase over House.....	4,500

I now move the previous question on the adoption of the report. The previous question was ordered; under the operation of which the conference report was agreed to.

Mr. BINGHAM. I now move that the House further insist upon its disagreement to the Senate amendments, and ask for a further conference.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. BINGHAM, Mr. MCCALL of Tennessee, and Mr. DOCKERY.

SENATE EXPENDITURES.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the House and the country upon the adoption of this conference report, whereby the fee system as to United States marshals and attorneys is replaced by fixed salaries.

At the time this bill was being originally considered by the House I made some remarks in opposition to the pernicious fee system. I stated then that this reform was beneficial and far-reaching, that it would operate to forbid petty persecutions and prosecutions of honest citizens, and that it would result in a large reduction of the cost of maintaining the courts of the United States. This prediction will be fully verified by the bill agreed upon.

Mr. Speaker, there are yet remaining several items in controversy between the two Houses. Many of them are relatively unimportant, and a conclusion will probably be reached upon the greater number of them at the next meeting of the conferees. It may be well to state, however, that the very considerable increase of the salaries of Senate employees is a subject of stubborn contention. The bill as already agreed upon carries $338,162.50 for the compensation of 295 employees of this body. This amount is exclusive of the salaries of Reporters of Debates, reporters of committees, and the reimbursement to members for clerk hire, and it shows that the average cost per Representative for the pay of the House employees is $939.

The bill as it comes to us from the Senate, and insisted upon by the Senate conferees, appropriates $403,529.90 for the salaries of 278 Senate employees. This amount does not include Senate Reporters of Debates, committee reporters, and clerks to Senators. The per capita cost, therefore, per Senator on account of the compensation of Senate employees is $4,463.

Notwithstanding this, the Senate now insists that the salaries of Senators' personal clerks be increased from $1,200 to $1,500 per annum, and the compensation of clerks to certain unimportant committees from $1,440 to $1,800 per annum. The House conferees have earnestly resisted this proposed increase of compensation, it being their judgment that the present period of grave industrial depression is a peculiarly inopportune moment to increase the salaries of Federal officeholders.

Mr. Speaker, I will not further comment upon this comparative exhibit of the relative cost of maintaining the employees of the Senate and of the House. The facts I have submitted tell the story without the necessity for further comment or criticism.

In conclusion, I desire to incorporate as a part of my remarks the following interesting historical review, by Hon. Charles S. Hamlin, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, of the accounting system of the Government from the days of Alexander Hamilton until the present time. The entertaining recital of Secretary Hamlin shows the various changes made by "Uncle Sam" in his system of bookkeeping and the methods of transacting public business, and also shows that the new system of accounting secures economy, accuracy, and expedition.

THE DOCKERY COMMISSION PLAN SAVES $200,000 YEARLY.

"The old accounting system of the Government was established in 1789 by the First Congress, it being one of the many details of the original machinery of government authorized under the Constitution. Alexander Hamilton, then Secretary of the Treasury, was its reputed author. The system was one of double checks and divided responsibility.

"It provided for an auditor, by whom all accounts and claims against the Government were first examined; a comptroller, who revised the work of the auditor; a register, who registered the settlements; and a treasurer, who made payments upon warrants issued after settlements.

"At the time of the adoption of the system the area of the country was less than 830,000 square miles, its population less than 4,000,000, and its annual expenditures only about $500,000. The appropriations made by Congress for the support of the Government for the calendar year 1789 were expressed in a statute of 13 lines. For nearly thirty years thereafter the appropriations for the conduct of the several Departments were made in the most general terms, without stating the number of persons to be employed, specifying the salaries to be paid, or stipulating amounts for any other public objects. It was the early practice under the system, and apparently its design, to have all accounts against the Government (except possibly those for the Army and Navy) paid only after audit by the accounting officers.

"The growth of the country in area and population and the increase in public expenditures required in time many changes to be made in the original system. The first important change was in 1792, when the office of accountant for the War Department was created, with authority to settle accounts relating to that Department, and to whom advances of moneys were to be made for all expenses of the Department. In 1798 a similar office was created for the Navy Department. This material departure from the original theory continued until 1817, when these offices were abolished, and there was created in the Treasury a second comptroller, and a second, a third, and a fourth auditor, with jurisdiction over the War and Navy accounts. Other important changes in the system were those conferring on the General Land Office power to audit its own accounts, subject to revision only by the Comptroller; the creation, in 1836, of an auditor for the Post-Office Department, with power to settle finally all accounts of the postal service, subject to appeal to the Comptroller; the creation, in 1849, of the office of Commissioner of Customs, to relieve the Comptroller of such of his labors as applied to customs accounts; and, in 1867, the passage of the important act requiring in express terms an administrative examination of accounts by the Executive Departments before their submission to the accounting officers of the Treasury."

"This system, thus built upon and patched about, requiring a triplicate examination as to expenditures and a quadruple examination as to customs receipts, exhibited two fatal weaknesses, namely, an unavoidable delay in the final settlement of accounts, and an utter lack of power to require uniformly those entrusted with public funds to make punctual settlements. It failed in the fundamental proposition recognized by every Government and by every business establishment—that the essential virtue of an audit consists in the audit being as nearly contemporaneous with the receipt or expenditure as it is practicable to make it, and in the other equally fundamental proposition that sound business principles require that agents be compelled to account for funds already in hand before approval is granted to requisitions for further advances.

HOW MONEY IS DRAWN.

"Money is drawn from the Treasury, after appropriation by Congress, under two forms of warrants: First, accountable warrants, by which money is advanced to disbursing agents, to be accounted for after expenditure; second, by settlement warrants for money payable after audit and approval by the accounting officers. Of the enormous expenditures of the Government for the fiscal year 1895, excluding those of the postal service, about 91 per cent are paid under accountable warrants, and only about 9 per cent under settlement warrants. These percentages demonstrate that the audit of accounts by Treasury officials serves only to determine, in large measure, simply whether expenditures have been made in accordance with the forms of law, and that the accounts rendered therefor are mathematically correct, and that after an administrative examination of accounts by the Department responsible for the expenditure any system of Treasury auditing requiring another examination by more than one set of competent clerks serves only to cause delay, dangerous to the Government, and an indefensible extravagance.

"Any accounting system devised, no matter how wisely, more than a century ago is necessarily primitive when applied to conditions existing to-day, and to a country that has increased in area from less than 830,000 to more than 3,600,000 square miles, with a population that has grown from less than 4,000,000 to 70,000,000, and with expenditures approximating $500,000,000 instead of $500,000 annually.

"From its original theory of an auditor and a comptroller, the old system developed in the course of a century into a hydra-headed creation of five auditors acting under three comptrollers, a Department bureau (the General Land Office) settling its own accounts directly with one of the comptrollers, and a sixth auditor acting independently of a comptroller, except upon appeal.

"Under acts of Congress or by Executive regulations, the jurisdiction of the several auditors and comptrollers was confusing and utterly incomprehensible to the average citizen having to do with public affairs. One auditor settled a portion of the accounts of a Department, while other accounts of the same Department were settled by another auditor, and sometimes by two other auditors. The two comptrollers and the Commissioner of Customs (acting as a comptroller) construed statutes affecting public accounts without any pretense as to harmony of conclusions.

[A statute passed in 1878 was construed by one of the comptrollers as a statute of limitation against certain claims, while another of the comptrollers held that the same statute was not one of limitation.]

"The necessity for a reform in this anomalous accounting system had been recognized and pressed upon public attention for many years; radical changes therein had been recommended by Secretaries of the Treasury and other public officials, and it had been the subject of investigation and report by committees of Congress. That no change was effected until the new system was inaugurated in October, 1894, under an act of Congress, is not greatly to be wondered at when all the obstacles in the way of so radical and far-reaching a reform are considered. Some officials in the public service opposed a change, fearing that it might adversely affect themselves. Others, for years absorbed in the daily treadmill of their office routine, could not see anything better than the methods in whose practice they had grown old. Tradesmen, real-estate agents, and others inveighed against any change, fearing lest their business might be injured thereby through a diminution of public employments. There were others who, from honest differences of opinion, antagonized the new system as it was proposed."

JOINT COMMISSION.

"The joint commission of Congress commonly known as the Dockery commission, authorized by the act approved March 3, 1893, consisted of three Representatives and three Senators, as follows: Representatives A. M. DOCKERY, J. D. RICHARDSON, NELSON DINGLEY, Jr., and Senators F. M. COCKRELL, J. K. JONES, and S. M. CULLOM. Hon. A. M. DOCKERY, of Missouri, was made chairman. After many months of patient investigation and arduous toil, in which they were aided by the Secretary of the Treasury, by other public officials in the various Departments, and by efficient and experienced experts drawn from the business world, a new system was agreed upon.

"The new accounting system, as crystallized into a statute approved July 31, 1894, went into successful operation on October 1 of that year, and retains every feature of the old system that was of value. The primary or administrative audit of accounts by the several Departments is strengthened and extended, notably in the case of the Department of Justice. The offices of the First and Second Comptroller and Commissioner of Customs were abolished, with their deputies and numerous other subordinates. In their place there was created the office of Comptroller of the Treasury, to exercise all the functions performed by the three officers named, thus avoiding conflicting decisions and concentrating responsibility.

"The auditors, instead of being known by numbers, are given titles indicative of their duties. Their action in settling accounts coming to them after an administrative audit is made final and conclusive against the executive branch of the Government, except that an appeal may be taken from their decisions to the Comptroller of the Treasury by the head of the Department interested, or by the Comptroller of the Treasury himself, or by the claimant, or by the Secretary of the Treasury, upon any question of law or fact. The statute requires that when an auditor makes an original construction or modifies an existing construction of statutes, such decision shall be forthwith reported to the Comptroller of the Treasury, and the payment of items affected by the decision withheld until the Comptroller shall approve, disapprove, or modify the decision.

"This provision will necessarily beget a uniform rule of action applying to all public accounts. It authorizes the head of any Department or any disbursing officer to apply to the Comptroller of the Treasury for a decision upon any payment to be made, the decisions thus obtained to govern in the settlement of the account containing the disbursement. It requires also that where a claim is presented to an auditor before an administrative examination has been made the auditor must cause the claim to be examined by two of his subordinates, independently of each other. The new law further requires that upon the allowance of an account or claim the head of the Department interested shall forthwith be notified of the allowance, affording him opportunity to appeal if he believes the interest of the Government requires it. This privilege of appeal is made effective by a provision requiring the Secretary of the Treasury to fix a time that shall elapse between an allowance of an account and the issuance of a warrant therefor, thus affording the administrative Department opportunity to take an appeal, if one be necessary.

CHECK ON DISBURSING OFFICERS.

"Another innovation of the new system which was believed at the time and has since been proven by experience to be a most important and valuable feature, is the one requiring that every requisition for an advance of money, before being acted upon by the Secretary of the Treasury, shall be sent to the proper auditor for his action and requiring that the auditor withhold his approval unless the accounts of the disbursing officer for whom the advance is asked have been forwarded to his Department at Washington within a specified time and have been forwarded by that Department to the auditor within another specified time. This provision is mandatory and is the most effectual method of preventing frauds against the Government that can be devised by any system of auditing. Under its operation, immediately after the enactment of the new law, disbursing officers were found to be in arrears in the settlement of their accounts—officers who were chargeable with millions of dollars, which they had expended for public purposes and for which they had rendered no accounts for settlement, although directed by law to do so. All of the accounts of each Department of the Government are required to be settled by the one Auditor, whose new title indicates his jurisdiction thereof, as for instance, all of the accounts of the War Department go to the Auditor for the War Department instead of, as previously, to the First, Second, and Third Auditors, whose titles indicated nothing and whose confused jurisdiction rested upon inexplicable construction of conflicting statutes or Treasury regulations.

"Under the new methods the work of settlement of public accounts is now as nearly current as it is practicable to have it under any system, while under the old system the work was from three months to two years in arrears in the offices of the several auditors.

"The new system has been in successful operation since October 1, 1894. It meets the unqualified approval of all the accounting officers of the Treasury and heads of Departments and other officials who have given the subject attention and who have publicly expressed opinions concerning it, and it is being effectually administered at an annual saving of nearly a quarter of a million of dollars as compared with the cost of the old system. It insures accuracy in a degree equal to if not superior to the old system, while it is more economical and vastly more expeditious."

EVENING SESSION FOR DEBATE ON PENSION BILL.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent that we may have a session of the House to-night, beginning at 8 o'clock and extending not later than 11 o'clock, for the purpose of debate only on the pending bill relating to pensions.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Dakota?

Mr. ERDMAN. Mr. Speaker, there is leave to print already upon this bill, and I hardly see the necessity for acceding to that request.

Mr. PICKLER. I hope the gentleman will not object to it; there are many gentlemen who desire to be heard.

Mr. ERDMAN. I will not object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

CONSIDERATION OF PRIVATE PENSION BILLS.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to submit for consideration the resolution I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That on Saturday, May 2, immediately after the reading of the Journal, the House shall resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House for the purpose of considering private pension bills and bills removing charges of desertion; and that in Committee of the Whole debate on each bill shall be limited to ten minutes, this time to be divided equally between those favoring and those opposing the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. ERDMAN. I object.

SEED DISTRIBUTION.

Mr. ODELL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present for present consideration the resolution I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Postmaster of this House is hereby authorized to employ not to exceed four assistant laborers, at not exceeding $3 per day, for such time, not exceeding twenty days, as shall be necessary to distribute and deliver to the members of this House the garden seeds which are arriving in carload lots, and such assistants shall be paid for such service out of the House contingent fund.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, I know the Agricultural Department has requested members to deliver the labels for seeds, assuring them that they would be filled by the office and mailed without going through our House post-office. Thus far there has been, as far as I am aware, no glut here of the seed or any necessity for the force proposed by this resolution. It may be necessary, but I think it would be better, before consent is given, to refer this matter to the Committee on Accounts for consideration.

Mr. LAYTON. It is entirely necessary, let me say to the gentleman.

Mr. ODELL. The members of the Committee on Accounts who are present have examined the resolution and agree upon the necessity for its adoption.

Mr. COX. I would like to ask my colleague a question.

Mr. McMILLIN. Certainly.

Mr. MEREDITH. My friend, let me say, is mistaken about there being no glut of seed here.

Mr. ODELL. Entirely mistaken.

Mr. COX. The question I would like to ask is this: Was it not understood that if members would send their franks to the Secretary of Agriculture he would furnish them to the parties who were to supply the seed for distribution?

Mr. McMILLIN. I do not know how that may be. I understood that if the franks were sent to the Department the packages of seed would go directly from the Department to the addresses given, and that there would be no necessity for sending them through our post-office here.

Mr. COX. I think my friend is mistaken in that.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, if it can be shown that there is a necessity for this, I do not propose to stand in the way of it, and therefore I am entirely willing to have it considered, if we can have such a statement made as will show the necessity for its adoption.

Mr. ODELL. I will say that the necessity for the passage of this resolution consists in a desire on the part of a great many members to have the seeds sent to them in bulk, so that they may distribute them as they please. While a great many of the members have sent their franks to the Agricultural Department, yet there are a great many who want their seeds sent to them in bulk, and that requires the sending of the seeds through the Post-Office Department. There are already two or three carloads of seeds awaiting the disposition of the postmaster here now, and others are arriving, which can not be handled by the post-office help.

Mr. McMILLIN. Do I understand that they have been sent to the postmaster here?

Mr. ODELL. They are to be distributed through the House post-office; yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PICKLER. I ask that the resolution to which objection was made, fixing next Saturday for private pensions, be referred to the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it will be referred to the Committee on Rules.

There was no objection.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Speaker, I now move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of the general pension bill.

CONDEMNED CANNON, REEDSBURG, WIS.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold that motion just for a moment?

Mr. PICKLER. I will withhold it if it is just for a moment.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 4932) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Navy to donate four pieces of condemned cannon and four pyramids of condemned cannon balls to the city of Reedsburg, Wis.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which will be reported by the Clerk.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to donate four pieces of condemned cannon and four pyramids of condemned cannon balls to the city of Reedsburg, Wis., for use in completing the soldiers' monument at that place: Provided, That the same can be spared without detriment to the service and that no expense is thereby incurred by the Government.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

JOSEPH S. BUNKER.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 649) granting a pension to Joseph S. Bunker.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension roll the name of Joseph S. Bunker, a soldier in the Southern or Sabine war of 1836, and allow him a pension rated at $15 per month.

The Committee on Pensions recommended an amendment, striking out "fifteen" and inserting "eight."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. DINGLEY. One moment. What war was that?

Mr. TERRY. The Sabine Indian disturbances. By accident this was omitted from the general bill covering these old Indian wars. A number of these old men, I understand, had already been put upon the rolls before it was discovered that they were not provided for in the bill.

Mr. DINGLEY. Is this one of a whole class of men who are not now pensioned?

Mr. TERRY. I do not think there are many of them alive now.

Mr. DINGLEY. This seems to be adopting a new class.

Mr. TERRY. No; this House has been giving relief of this kind for a number of sessions.

Mr. DINGLEY. Has there been any relief given to soldiers serving in this particular war?

Mr. TERRY. Oh, yes; several times. Several bills have already passed. This man is about 80 years old, and if you are going to do anything for him, it is time to do it now.

Mr. LOUD. How many of these bills has the gentleman himself presented?

Mr. TERRY. This is the second one I have presented.

Mr. LOUD. How many more have you got?

Mr. TERRY. I have not any more now.

Mr. LOUD. Will you agree not to present any more?

Mr. TERRY. No; you can not put me under bond in that way.

Mr. DINGLEY. When did that war occur?

Mr. CROWTHER. I should like to ask the gentleman from Arkansas whether he attends the Friday night sessions of the House?

Mr. TERRY. I did while I thought there was any chance of doing anything, and then I quit.

Mr. LOUD. I should like to suggest to the gentleman that there is no room for privates anyway. They spend all the time in pensioning generals.

Mr. TERRY. Well, this man is a private.

Mr. PAYNE. I would like to know, Mr. Speaker, from the gentleman from Arkansas whether there is anything in reference to the history of that war that would justify taking this case up out of the regular order.

Mr. TERRY. I think it is just following the usual order we have been taking, and if it has to wait until we can consider it in the Friday night sessions we will not be able to get anything done.

Mr. DOCKERY. I understand the gentleman wants the bill passed?

Mr. TERRY. I would like to have the bill passed while this man is living.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to consider this bill under the five-minute rule as in Committee of the Whole. I only want to know what war this man served in, and whether he is fairly entitled to be pensioned. Now that, I think, we are entitled to know, and I hope unanimous consent will be given. There is no objection to considering it in the House.

Mr. PICKLER. When?

Mr. CANNON. At any time.

Mr. PICKLER. Not now.

Mr. TERRY. Here is the report. It will explain the whole matter.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PICKLER. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the pension bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. PAYNE in the chair.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Speaker, I hope this will be considered "unfinished business."

The SPEAKER. It seems unfinished. [Laughter.]

PENSIONS.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill H. R. 8271.

Mr. PICKLER. I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from New York.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not understand that the gentleman from South Dakota has any time to yield.

Mr. PICKLER. Does the Chair hold that the chairman of the committee has no control over the time?

The CHAIRMAN. Only by consent of committee unanimously obtained.

Mr. PICKLER. It has been done unanimously heretofore.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thought the Chair was recognizing members.

Mr. PICKLER. If the Chair is going to assume control of the time, it is a very strange matter that the committee should not have control of it.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I ask to be recognized for thirty minutes in my own right.

The CHAIRMAN. Public business will await the pleasure of gentlemen.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Chairman, I ask to be recognized for thirty minutes in my own right.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will wait a moment, until order can be obtained. [After a pause.] The gentleman from New York is recognized for fifteen minutes.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Chairman, I deem it to be my duty to make a few remarks on this general pension bill, in view of the fact that I was made for two or three days the target of villification and abuse during the consideration of the pension appropriation bill in the early part of this session.

By the rules of our House, according to our standing rules, every Friday evening is devoted to the consideration of measures in violation of the existing law—that is, to bills for the relief of deserters, and to private pension bills in contravention of the provisions of existing statutes. I do not believe in special legislation. If you wish to provide pensions for the widows of officers, pass a general pension bill. If you wish to provide for a certain class of cases, provide for that class by general statute; but do not by rule devote one evening in a week to the consideration of bills which practically violate the laws upon our statute books.

Now, on one of the evenings in March, when these particular bills were under consideration, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CONNOLLY], who addressed the committee, took occasion to attack the leaders of this House, and in speaking of the general pension bill he said, "Why does that bill sleep? Why is no earnest step taken to have it passed?" And then he told us something about the chains which held back the majority. He said:

But there is a power somewhere in this House that is blocking this thing, holding it back; and I insist that with the numbers we have we break the chains that are binding on this side of the House.

Well, gentlemen, if there were any chains holding you back, if there were any fetters binding you from entering upon the consideration and passage of a general pension law such as this, I say it is a great pity for the American people, it is a great pity for our overburdened taxpayers, that these chains are not binding you to-day. That evening was a memorable evening, because a peculiarly objectionable bill was then passed, and that was a bill pensioning a photographer, a man not enlisted, not connected with the Army in any way, not wounded in battle, but wounded, it would seem, by a stray shot, and as to whose disability there was considerable doubt as to its being the result of the shot. That bill was passed, and the President of the United States, on the 21st day of April, vetoed it, saying in conclusion:

It seems to me an extension of pension relief to such cases would open the door to legislation hard to justify and impossible to restrain from abuse.

The passage of that bill furnishes an apt illustration of the danger of passing private pension bills enlarging the scope of our pension laws without full and careful consideration and examination. Now, we have devoted several days to the consideration of this general pension bill, and it has come before the House in its amended form free from some of the gravest objections to the original bill; but the bill to-day remains as it was in its inception, a bill for the relief of deserters, a bill for the relief of ex-Confederates, and a bill to remove the requirement of dependence of the widow which is found in the act of June 27, 1890.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I believe in giving full, fair, and adequate pensions to the men who were disabled or wounded in the Union service in the line of duty, and to the widows of such men. I believe that they can not be too fully paid. Moreover, I am willing that the act of 1890 shall remain as it stands upon our statute book. But, gentlemen, I tell you there is a sentiment in this country, there is a feeling among the intelligent people, among the very masses throughout the United States, against the further enlargement of the pension laws, against the enlargement of the dependent pension act of June 27, 1890. We have listened for several days to bombastic and turgid oratory. We have listened to gentlemen who would fain make you believe that there never had been any patriotism in any country until the breaking out of our civil war. From the earliest times, Mr. Chairman, from the time of prehistoric man, patriotism has been found among all peoples, and I would be the last man to fail to give the full meed of praise to the patriot and the soldier who dies for his country. You remember that one of our greatest poets, after speaking of the terrors of death, says:

But to the hero, when his sword
Has won the battle for the free,
Thy voice sounds like a prophet's word,
And in its hollow tones are heard
The thanks of millions yet to be.

I believe, sir, that by every man who fell fighting for his country in our civil war, as in every other patriotic struggle, the thanks of millions yet to be could be heard in his death knell. [Applause.] But, sir, that is not the question before the committee to-day. It is no question of giving money, of granting full and adequate pensions to the men who were slain on the battlefield, to the men who were wounded on the battlefield, to the men who incurred disease or disability in the service in the line of duty.

What is it that you propose to do? Not to extend the operations of the dependent pension act of June 27, 1890, to the deserving; not to extend the scope and operation of that act to those who would fairly come within its existing provisions. But it is proposed here deliberately, in the year 1896, thirty-one years after the close of the war, to impose upon the people an added burden of five or six millions per annum in order to pay what? To pay largess, to pay bounty to the men who were base enough, after having fought under another flag, to become mercenaries under the flag of the United States. I respect, I admire every man who fought only under the Union flag. I respect every man who fought only under the Confederate flag. But I have no respect, I have no admiration, I have only contempt for the men who, having fought under one flag, were base and cowardly enough, either from fear or for purposes of gain, to seek refuge under the opposite banner; and I believe that that feeling is entertained by many gentlemen on the other side of the aisle.

I do not believe that you as a whole, gentlemen, desire to pension the ex-Confederates, who are not entitled to your respect and who never should receive the respect of the men on this side of the House. Have we not done enough for the ex-Confederates already? We began with a very wise provision. Section 4716 of the Revised Statutes, passed, if I mistake not, first in 1863, reenacted in 1864, and then again reenacted in substance in 1873, provided that—

No money on account of pension shall be paid to any person or to the widow, children, or heirs of any deceased person who in any manner engaged in or aided or abetted the late rebellion against the authority of the United States.

Was not that a wise and proper provision of law? And yet on the 3d day of March, 1877, we modified and amended or practically repealed the operation of that section, so as to let in the ex-Confederates who had been wounded or disabled in the line of duty in the service of the Union. The act of 1877 provided that this section 4716 should not be construed to apply to such persons as afterwards voluntarily enlisted in the Army of the United States, and who, while in such service, incurred disability from wound or injury received or disease contracted in the line of duty. Was not that amendment sufficiently broad? I call the attention of the committee to the fact, which appears by the report of Assistant Secretary of the Interior, John M. Reynolds, that when a man was compulsorily forced to enlist in the Confederate army he is allowed, under the existing construction of the law, to receive a pension.

What is the next objectionable feature in this bill? But before I go on to discuss the special provisions of the bill I will ask the Chair what time I have remaining.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has two minutes remaining. Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Did I not have thirty minutes, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman had fifteen.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I understood that I was allowed thirty minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair stated to the gentleman that he was recognized for fifteen minutes.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I did not so understand it, and I now ask the gentleman from South Dakota to give me fifteen minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota has no more time.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Then I ask unanimous consent that I be allowed to proceed for fifteen minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BARTLETT] asks unanimous consent that he be allowed to continue his remarks for fifteen minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to know if there is any limit upon any member except by the rule of the House which allows each member one hour?

The CHAIRMAN. There is no limit unless the gentleman makes an agreement with the Chair or is recognized by the Chair for a certain length of time.

Mr. PICKLER. Will the Chair recognize members of the committee when they wish to speak?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will endeavor to recognize members of the committee when they express a desire to be recognized.

Mr. PICKLER. I did not know whether you would or not. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARTLETT] for unanimous consent that he be allowed to proceed for fifteen minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. PICKLER. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made.

Mr. PICKLER. I object for this reason: There are a great many members who desire to be heard on this bill, and the Chair has already given a good deal of time to gentlemen who are not members of the committee, and—

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York that he be allowed to proceed for fifteen minutes? [A pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Chairman, I say that if we further extend the scope and operations of the pension act of 1890, we break faith with the people of the United States; we break that faith which was pledged to them when the act of 1890 was passed by the Congress of the United States. Of course it was a somewhat singular proposition to enlarge the scope of pension legislation, then beyond that which had ever found favor in any other country in the world; for I believe that I am accurate when I state that there is no such pension act as the dependent pension act on the statute books of any other country in the world, and no such measure has ever found favor or advocacy in any other country in the world.

It was a measure to enlarge pension legislation so that it would include hundreds of thousands of new applicants, so that it would involve an additional burden upon the people of the United States of millions and millions of dollars per annum, and in favor of whom? In favor, not of those men who, according to the words of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CONKOLLY], bore the heat and burden of the fray, but men who were only ninety days in the service of their country, many of them. At the time of the passage of that bill it was stated by Senator DAVIS of Minnesota, who had charge of the measure in the Senate, that the whole additional burden or cost would be only some $35,000,000, and that estimate in debate was increased only to about $40,000,000. What has been the practical result? That we are paying $61,000,000 per annum. This very year we are paying $61,000,000 or more to men or women who have filed applications under the provisions of the act of June 27, 1890. And now you propose to enlarge that act, as I have said, in favor of the deserter, in favor of the ex-Confederate, in favor of the woman who does not need a pension, and the result will be an additional burden of some five or six millions of dollars.

Among the objectionable sections of this bill is the first section, which gives to ex-Confederates the benefit of the provisions of the act of June 27, 1890, and which repeals section 4716 of the Revised Statutes and the amendatory act of March 3, 1877. I may say in passing that not one of these sections has any merit. They are either declaratory of the law as construed by the Pension Bureau, by the Interior Department, or they are pernicious in their purpose and intended operation.

The third section is objectionable, because it assumes that our efficient Commissioner of Pensions, General Lochren, who I believe is a fair, honest, and able administrator of his office, and further, that his chief, the Assistant Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Reynolds, and the Secretary of the Interior himself, Mr. Hoke Smith—that each and every one of them has improperly administered the existing pension laws. It assumes that all the cases, going back to a somewhat arbitrary date, January 7, 1893, should be reopened, that they must be reopened; and by that assumption we virtually hold that the cases already decided have been dishonestly and unfairly decided. Now, without some reason, Mr. Chairman, without some argument, without some clear evidence and proof, I do not believe that it is fair to attack the administration of any Department of this Government.

The most objectionable section is section 13, which alters the act of 1890 in this respect: It makes an honorable discharge no longer necessary. It says in substance that it matters not whether a man was a deserter, whether he ran away and enlisted again for merely mercenary reasons and received a bounty jumper's reward. Give him a pension; let him come in; let the coward and the deserter receive the benefit of our enlarged pension laws! It provides that a pension shall be received under the act of 1890, notwithstanding what? The words "dishonorable discharge" are a little too severe, but the substance is couched in more euphemistic language:

Notwithstanding a prior service from which the person on whose service the claim depends was not honorably discharged.

Not "dishonorably discharged," but simply "not honorably discharged." And so we are asked to let in all the bounty jumpers, all the deserters, provided they hoodwinked the authorities, and, having enlisted under their own names, made a subsequent fraudulent enlistment and served their ninety days. Give such men the benefit of our pension laws! Why, gentlemen, I think the proposition is too monstrous even to find favor with the most extreme advocate of the enlargement of our pension system.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Suppose a man was forced to join a Southern regiment, but was a Union man, and at the first opportunity had deserted and enlisted in the Union Army. Will you provide him a pension?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. In answer to that question, Mr. Chairman, I shall call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that in Lougee's appeal (7 Pension Decisions, 586) it was announced relative to service in the Confederate army as affecting right to pension under act of June 27, 1890:

That where there is a record of service in the Confederate army, whether by conscription or otherwise, such record failing to show whether such service was voluntary or involuntary, it will be presumed that service was voluntary; and while such presumption may be rebutted, the burden of proof is on him to show that such service was not voluntary.

That, it will be conceded, is perfectly proper. Now, I go on to read the next section:

Where it is shown that a claimant voluntarily engaged in or aided and abetted the rebellion, his claim under the act of June 27, 1890, should be rejected under section 4716, Revised Statutes; but where it is shown that a claimant's service was wholly compulsory, who was conscripted into the Confederate army, he is excepted from the operation of section 4716, Revised Statutes.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. I ask for the gentleman's individual opinion.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. In cases where a man was forced into the Confederate service, I have no objection.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Where you can discriminate that class from the other class you have been describing?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Where you can not discriminate, no pension at all should be paid.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Does the gentleman think that no pension should be paid to men who deserve a pension who were forced into the Confederate army?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. What I say is that where a man can show that his service was compulsory, not voluntary—that he was forced into the Army—let him have the pension. But where, as in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred—yes, I may say as in nine hundred and ninety-nine cases out of a thousand—the service was entirely voluntary, no pension should be paid to the man under any circumstances; and I claim that the act of March 3, 1877, giving such man a pension when wounded or disabled in the line of duty is radically wrong and absolutely improper.

Mr. PICKLER. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Certainly.

Mr. PICKLER. The Mexican soldier who was drawing a pension and who went into the Confederate army had his pension stopped under that section for a time; the soldier who served in the Indian wars and who was drawing a pension and afterwards went into the Confederate army had his pension also stopped for a time; and so of the Navy as well as of the Army. Now, there have been five different acts of Congress with reference to these matters restoring these pensions. Let me ask the gentleman from New York, then, why should he treat the Union soldier differently or with less consideration than he is willing to give to the soldier of the Mexican war or the Indian wars?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I am not in favor of treating the soldier in any war in any different manner. I favor treating all alike, and if improper laws have been passed by the Congress of the United States in the past it is not within my power to revise them all to-day.

Mr. PICKLER. But take the case of a man who served in the Confederate army and afterwards went into the Union service and was disabled and injured in the defense of the Union. I would like to ask the gentleman why he would treat him differently from the Mexican war soldier or any other soldier?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I have never voted to treat the soldier of the Mexican war in the way the gentleman refers to.

Mr. PICKLER. But do you object to that principle? Can you say that a man who served in the Confederate army and afterwards went into the Union service and became disabled is any less entitled to the pension than the man who served in the Mexican war and afterwards went into the Confederate service and had his pension restored?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. If such a thing was done with reference to the other wars in which this country was engaged it does not make it right to repeat the wrong in this case. It is clearly wrong, clearly improper, and I do not advocate any such provision in any statute.

Mr. MILNES. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I have but a very brief time, and will yield to the gentleman for a question but not an argument.

Mr. MILNES. Only a question. The gentleman made a statement a moment ago, if I understood him aright, that an honorable discharge had been made unnecessary under this bill. Does the gentleman pretend to say that that is one of the effects of this bill?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I say a second discharge, if an honorable discharge, is held sufficient to wipe out a previous dishonorable discharge. I contend that a previous dishonorable discharge ought to be sufficient to keep a man off the pension rolls at any time and for all time.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in conclusion, we have in this bill a provision of law which removes the necessity for dependence on the part of the widow, and provides that a widow who has an income of $300 a year can receive an additional pension of $96, when her sister, with no income whatever, is given but $96. That, I say, is unjust and manifestly unjust.

The bill changes the provision of the law of 1890 in three essential particulars. First, it lets in an enormous class of ex-Confederates to the pension roll who should never receive a dollar from the public Treasury. It further enlarges the law in this respect, that deserters—men who were dishonorably discharged from the service of the United States—may be restored to an honorable condition and receive a pension, and it further enlarges it so as to benefit a class of widows who do not need the benefit of the pension laws.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to testify to the pleasure and appreciation with which I have read the remarks of my colleague [Mr. McCLELLAN], from the city and State of New York. I honor the distinguished gentleman; I honor his courage and manliness and ability, and although I could not help noting the ridiculous criticism made upon him by a gentleman from another part of the State of New York—from the city of Buffalo—that criticism will be received either with utter indifference or with contempt.

Mr. MAHANY. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Certainly.

Mr. MAHANY. I understood the gentleman to say that I made an attack on my colleague from New York?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. In your remarks, if they were correctly reported in the RECORD, you said you were sorry to see the son of so distinguished a general blocking the path of justice for the veterans of the late war.

Mr. MAHANY. Does the gentleman construe that into an attack?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I should say it was an attack. Mr. MAHANY. The gentleman is entitled to his construction of the language.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I should certainly call a charge that the gentleman was blocking the path of justice an attack, notwithstanding the gentleman tells us that he is an inheritor of the splendid and inspiring possibilities of this Republic. [Laughter.] Now, most people are the inheritors of actualities. Most people do not inherit possibilities. I do not know of any law, either physical or legal, by which a man can inherit mere possibilities.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for ten minutes.

[Mr. GROSVENOR addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. KERR. Mr. Chairman, it has never been so difficult to secure a pension, and especially an adequate pension, as during the last three years. The Republican party in its years of power provided just and liberal pension laws, and while the executive and administrative officers were of its choosing no serious complaint was made against the Pension Bureau.

The unholy crusade against the old soldiers of the Republic by this Administration was not accidental in its origin nor purposed to secure needed reforms. It was begun designedly, with premeditation and malice aforethought. From beginning to end its infamous course has not been relieved by one redeeming quality.

The first message of the present President invited the attack, and in the very organization of his Administration the batteries of the Government were trained on the broken and decimated ranks of the boys in blue, upon the remnant of the once grand army, upon the remnant of the once magnificent legions of Grant and Sherman, that bore the old flag through sunshine and storm, in victory and defeat, from Philippi to Petersburg.

The appointment of the gentleman who presides over the Interior Department created an atmosphere in which patriotism itself has withered and made impossible a just administration of the pension laws. He was and is a post bellum Confederate civilian, and I do not use the word Confederate as a term of opprobrium. I admire and honor courage wherever it is displayed. I do not forget that 600,000 Americans fought in the Southern army for Southern homes and firesides, for what they believed to be right, and with a valor and heroism that made glorious and immortal the victory of the Union arms.

If a Confederate soldier had been appointed to administer the Interior Department I believe justice would have been done the Union soldiers. I conceive that it is not from this quarter that danger comes or is threatened, but rather from such cold-blooded civilians as the Secretary of the Interior and the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARTLETT], whose unreasonable and unpatriotic attack upon the pension appropriation bill is still remembered.

It would have been a most fitting thing, it would have more than half redeemed his fame, had the President appointed a Union soldier as Secretary of the Interior. It would have been proper had he appointed a Confederate soldier; one who, in good faith, had accepted the results and settlements of the war. But he appointed neither. He appointed a man who, no doubt, is patriotic in the ordinary qualities of that term and in the ordinary duties of office and citizenship, yet who was wholly unfit for one of the great duties of his position, namely, the administration of the Pension Office, because he had imbibed all the prejudices of his section against the Union cause and those who battled for it, and had not those prejudices softened and neutralized by the chivalry and comradeship which inheres in every soldier whether he marched under "Old Glory" or the Stars and Bars.

The President at the beginning of this profited much by the experience of his first Administration. He found vetoing private pension bills too slow for his sanguinary temperament. By that process the mortality of his attacks was limited by the number Congress attempted to put upon the roll. So he organized a machine—a bloodless but merciless guillotine—and for more than a year, and until an outraged public sentiment compelled the slackening of its operations, the old heroes were cut down right and left.

In the last three years ingratitude, "more strong than traitor's arms," has broken the hearts of thousands of soldiers and sent hundreds of them to their graves, their service and sacrifice unrequited. What a stain upon the Republic the rejection of a soldier's claim because, forsooth, according to the strictest letter of the law, he could not show whether the shock to his constitution, the drain upon his vitality, which had made him an old man while he was young, was received at Bull Run or Shiloh, at both of which places, fresh from home, he breasted the fierce waves of battle like a veteran; whether he got it in the dark cedars of Murfreesboro or in the storm of death at Vicksburg; whether in the tangles of the Wilderness, by the stone bridge at Antietam, or in beating back the tide of treason at Gettysburg; in scaling the slopes of Lookout to fight above the clouds with old Joe Hooker, in the sweep up and over Missionary Ridge, or with Sherman in his immortal march to the sea—the blood of Cæsar must be produced to prove that Brutus struck, or no. The venue, the place, the when, the time, has undone thousands of soldiers who were in the Army from Mill Springs to Appomattox. These men, victorious on a score of battlefields, have fallen before the invincibility of the impossible. In all reason, what difference is it whether the disability was incurred in '62, '63, '64, or '65? The ancient doctrine of venue and time was never so strictly enforced as in the Pension Bureau under this Administration. The obstacles erected in the pathway of the soldiers have wrought the desired result. Let me prove it.

During the last year of Harrison's Administration there were granted under the act of 1890, 62,291 invalid pensions, and under Cleveland's 8,810. During the last year of Republican rule there were 36,917 widows' claims allowed, and under the first year of this Administration 16,026.

But let us look at the adjudications under the old law. During Harrison's last year in office there were granted 10,223 invalid pensions, and in President Cleveland's first year 6,129. During the last year of Republican Administration 7,295 widows' claims were allowed, and during the first year of this Administration 4,225.

As I have intimated, these figures demonstrate not only a result, but a change in the system and practice in the Pension Office. In these figures we see the cause and ground of the discontent which has prevailed among the soldiers, and which has aroused patriotic resentment and protest all over the country.

Let me dwell a moment longer on this point. Of the 1,443,666 pensions thus far allowed, 1,234,349 were granted by Republican Pension Commissioners. Of the thirty-three years since this Bureau was created the Democrats have controlled seven years and the Republicans twenty-six years, or in other words, substantially one-fifth of the time has been under Democratic Administration and four-fifths under Republican. Now, what does all this show? That the Democrats have held the Pension Office one-fifth of the time and have granted less than one-seventh of the pensions.

In this brief history we get some idea of the diluted and adulterated patriotism of the present Administration. If the pension laws were administered with that patriotism and fidelity to duty which characterized the service of the soldiers to the country no complaint would ever reach the Pension Office. [Applause.]

The report of the Pension Commissioner shows that there were sent out during the last year 142,289 "credibility witness letters," or an average of 474 per day, or 59 per hour, or about 1 a minute. These letters seek and invite information, or rather opinions, upon which to reject affidavits and evidence filed by soldiers to establish their pension claims. This proceeding is contrary to the whole course and spirit of legal investigation in every American tribunal save in the Pension Office. The answers to these letters are not under oath, and not required to be. Under this system a small postmaster at a crossroads may strike down and annihilate the evidence of half a dozen reputable citizens.

A wise man once said that the common law was the perfection of reason, and as near as a human institution can be it is. It has preserved Anglo-Saxon liberty for many centuries. The three main pillars in this temple of jurisprudence are, first, an impartial tribunal; second, the right to a clear and truthful statement of the charge; and third, the right to face and cross-examine the witness by which the charge was to be sustained. Every one of these fundamental principles has been violated in the organization and practice of the Pension Office.

In a civil suit a contention between litigants in a court of justice about property of smallest value no evidence is received except it be under oath. No evidence will be admitted unless the adverse party has or has had an opportunity to cross-examine the witness. Now, take this time-sanctioned and time-seasoned system, the crystallization of the wisdom of centuries, the product of the most enlightened system of jurisprudence in the world, and put over against it this modern method of character assassination, and we have some conception of the monstrous injustice which has been practiced against the soldiers.

An applicant's witnesses are destroyed, and he knows not from whence the blow proceeded. Three or four or five good citizens may be blackened and their evidence rejected upon the tale of a small politician told to satisfy his private malice or under the delusion that he is doing God's service in helping the Democratic party. There is no system of jurisprudence so barbarous but that it would be dishonored by this proceeding and practice.

It is simply a proceeding by which witnesses are impeached—that and nothing more. In every State in the Union, whether its practice is statutory or under the common law, the impeachment of a witness is a matter of grave importance; it proceeds with that formality and solemnity befitting its importance and the results. That is true not only in this Republic, but in every country where Anglo-Saxon institutions have been erected, and has been for five hundred years, save only in the Pension Office. To brand a man as a perjurer is a solemn thing; to deprive a man of his property or a right upon the assumption that his witnesses are false is a monstrous thing unless it is done by due course of law.

From the old days of Coke to this year of grace the legal and constitutional modus operandi of impeaching a witness has been fixed and clearly defined.

The first requisite is that the party whose credibility is to be attacked has the right to face the witnesses and cross-examine them. Again, although it may never have been written in the law, yet it is the unwritten rule that unless a certain number testify against his credibility the impeachment fails.

The second requisite is that the impeaching witnesses must live in the vicinity—the neighborhood—and be acquainted with the general reputation of the witness to be impeached as to truth and veracity. This testimony must not be predicated on particular transactions nor be the product of personal controversy or contention. To sum it all up, it must be what neighbors say and think of an individual's credibility, and not the private opinion of the witness. This salutary rule is wholly disregarded, and upon private and personal opinions testimony is rejected and affiants branded as perjurers.

But still again, in illustration of the obstacles thrown in the way of the soldiers in the Pension Office. The form required in taking evidence, in making affidavits, is onerous and unreasonable. Order No. 229 makes the pensioner's road a hard one to travel, and

I have no doubt it was so intended. No court, no matter what the issue—millions may be staked on the result, life or death may turn upon the judgment, yet whenever an affidavit is competent evidence the certificate of the officer that the affiant was duly sworn (and in some States that he is a credible person) is all that is required to admit it in evidence.

Order 229 reads as follows:

[Order No. 229.]

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
BUREAU OF PENSIONS,
Washington, D. C., June 19, 1893.

In the preparation of testimony in support of claims in pension cases all statements affecting the particular case and not merely formal must be written, or prepared to be typewritten, in the presence of the witness, and from his oral declarations then made to the person who then reduces the testimony to writing, or then prepares the same to be typewritten. And such testimony must embody a statement by the witness that such testimony was all written, or prepared for typewriting (as the case may be), in his presence, and only from his oral statements then made; stating also the time, place, and person, when, where, and to whom he made such oral statements, and that in making the same he did not use, and was not aided or prompted by any written or printed statement or recital prepared or dictated by any other person and not attached as an exhibit to his testimony.

Any needless delay in the preparation of such testimony after such oral statement by the witness or in forwarding the same to this Bureau and any material alteration or erasure will be cause for rejecting such testimony.

WM. LOCHREN, Commissioner.

Approved:

HOKE SMITH, Secretary.

I object to this regulation especially because it carries with it the suggestion that the soldier and his comrades will commit perjury unless they are so hedged about as to render it impossible. The soldier and his comrades are slandered by inference—they are branded as unworthy of belief unless by form and regulation; every opportunity to prevaricate is cut off and their premeditated crime frustrated. This, in my judgment, is infamous. But still more infamous is another practice. The evidence—and I use the word evidence in this connection as a term of convenience merely—secured in response to these witness credibility letters is filed away in secret archives. Access to it and knowledge of its import is denied the applicant. His claim is rejected and his witnesses declared unworthy of belief upon this character of testimony, upon information which he has never seen or heard, which he has had no opportunity to combat, deny, or explain.

The Pension Office indulges in presumptions against the soldier which should not obtain, and it declines to act upon presumptions in his favor which obtain in every system of enlightened jurisprudence. It has refused over and over again to presume a party dead whose absence ran into twenty, thirty, and forty years without tidings. It has presumed disabilities the result of vicious habits if proof was not furnished to the contrary. The equitable presumptions that good is to be presumed rather than evil, that a man's character is presumed good until it is proven bad, and that he is not to be found guilty of an immoral or infamous offense or habit without proof are wholly disregarded, although there is no place in the world where the flowers of justice and equity ought to find a more congenial soil in which to bloom than in the Pension Office. As it is now, if any bloom there they are exotics.

The law ought to be amended as to the widows of soldiers. Especially should we treat tenderly and liberally the war widows—they who kept safely the little flocks around the sacred hearthstone of home while the husband and father was battling for our country. How long shall they be compelled to exhaust the philosophy and science of pathology and sequence before a few paltry dollars from the nation's riches shall go to supply their needs and make physically comfortable for them the sunset slope of life?

This pension administration has employed assiduously and applied harshly the accumulated and refined science and mystery of all the generations of Esculapius to break the threads of proof stretching from the soldier's grave to "the weary marches, the hospitals of pain, the prison pens, and the fields of battle."

It ought, instead, to call into requisition the hundred eyes of Argus and the hundred hands of Briareus to find the broken strands and tie them. This narrow and technical construction of the pension laws is against the clearly defined and often expressed sentiment of the country.

The nation's appreciation of their service and its gratitude to the Union soldiers have been manifested in a hundred ways and more. The battlefields upon which they fought have been marked by monuments, and so far as cold marble can enshrine it the story of their heroism and patriotism will descend until these splendid memorials crumble to dust. Their bones have been gathered from fields swept with the storm of battle and laid in consecrated ground to sleep the ages out. Splendid homes have been built in which the old heroes can live in peace and comfort until they are mustered out to join the comrades on the other side. The great captains, wrought in stone and marble, keep sentinel watch upon the streets of the capital. On Memorial Day, amid the perfume of flowers and the sweet incense of beautiful speech, a nation lays upon their graves its tribute of thankfulness and love. This day, in a civic sense, is the most sacredly conspicuous of any in the calendar of the nation. It is a day of remembrance and reverence, all for the dead, and yet all the wealth of speech and eulogy, all the tribute of beautiful flowers and tears, can not throw a ray of light into the green tents in which they sleep nor add a shade of luster to their immortal fame. For them the chapter is ended, and their names are inscribed among the immortals. [Applause.]

How much more, then, should we do for the living. Lincoln was the embodiment and personification of grateful patriotism, and when he said it was the first duty of the redeemed country to take care of those who had borne the brunt of battle, their widows and orphans, he forced into a single sentence the most sacred obligation of the century. In that "dread tribunal where laws are silent and nations appear in arms for judgment" these men wrested liberty and republican government from the hands of those who would destroy them, and placed both beyond the reach of the iconoclastic hand of treason.

For three thousand years Thermopylae stood the highest headland in martial glory. The bloody angle at Gettysburg will stand above Thermopylae like a mountain above its foothills for the next three thousand years. [Applause.]

The sweep of Farragut up the Mississippi sinks into insignificance the maritime victories of Nelson and Decatur and the Greeks at Salamis.

The charge of the six hundred is embalmed in Tennyson's poem, but the charge of Pickett at Gettysburg will go down the centuries as the highest exhibition of courage and heroism in the annals of warfare. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, the day this Republic refuses or neglects to care for its soldiers commensurate with their deserts, that day will mark the beginning of its decadence. Let us avert that day by passing this law, and thus compel a fair and liberal administration of the pension laws. As for myself, if I should live so long and have a vote, I shall continue to the end to vote liberal pensions to the old soldiers until the last one has joined his comrades on the other shore.

If the opportunity presents itself, I shall vote against the proposition in regard to deserters. [Loud applause.]

Mr. MILES. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, it had not been my purpose to participate in this discussion at all, and therefore what I say will be couched in such language as may come to me as I proceed with my remarks. In the beginning of this session I was assigned to the foot of the table in the Invalid Pensions Committee room as one of a minority of four Democratic members. We have tried in the discharge of our duties as members of that committee to be as fair, as patriotic, and as liberal to the old soldiers of the country as a proper sense of our obligations to them and to our constituents would justify. But, because of the fact that I was born in a State ordinarily classed as a Southern State, and came from a people—I desire to state it frankly—who in the "late unpleasantness" sympathized with Lee and Jackson and the followers of those commanders in the South rather than with the followers of McClellan, of Sherman, and of Grant, I thought it perhaps indelicate that I should stand upon this floor, though born only a short while before somber war clouds were dispersed, to discuss questions of pension legislation for the Federal soldiers.

But as I know my heart and my conscience, Mr. Chairman, I have tried to put those things behind me; I have tried to recognize the fact that a brave and true and really good and "sure-enough" Union soldier is entitled to the benefit of liberal pension legislation by this now reunited country, and I have endeavored to act upon that theory. However, as I have intimated, I should not have participated in this discussion at all but that I have been provoked to do so by the course of this debate. Mr. Chairman, it is not true that this side of the House has dragged politics into this discussion. I call upon any member on the other side to point to one word of violent partisanship that has fallen from any Democratic member of the Invalid Pensions Committee or from any member on the Democratic side of this Chamber in discussing this question. But can as much be said of gentlemen on the other side? I desire to read at this point an extract from the brief remarks of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. STEWART] on this bill. He said:

I do not desire to influence the passions of party or draw invidious distinctions, but are any so blind as not to see that every obstacle is offered by the Bureau of Pensions and the Democratic Administration to the allowance of the just claims of the worthy soldier?

And then comes a remark which, if nothing else had been said by him or by other gentlemen on that side of the Chamber, would have goaded me into participation in this discussion:

Why are gentlemen on the other side so silent when a bill like the one under discussion, against which they offer no cohesion, is up for consideration and passage?

I do not know what the gentleman means by "cohesion"—Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. If the gentleman will permit me, that is a misprint; it should be "criticism."

Mr. MILES. Well, I do not stand upon verbal criticism. It is the thought which I think the gentleman intended to express in this language that I ask attention to, and not this mere word "cohesion," which, of course, in this connection, means nothing. The gentleman goes on to say—

Does their love for the old soldier restrain them, or rather do not considerations of settled opposition and indifference prevail?

Mr. Chairman, when the gentleman on the other side made that remark only one member on the Democratic side had addressed this committee, and that was the gentleman from New York, Mr. McCLELLAN. What has been said on this floor of the remarks of the gentleman from New York, who up to this time stood alone on his side of the Chamber in breaking that silence which the gentleman from New Jersey accepts as an evidence of opposition or indifference? I appeal to the fair-minded members of this House, without regard to party affiliations—I appeal to them to point to one remark made by the gentleman from New York in his discussion of this question which could be properly criticised as partaking of undue partisanship, or as tending to drag politics into the debate. And yet, sir, I regret that a veteran member of the Republican party, a distinguished member of the Judiciary Committee of this House, a man who, therefore, ought to be calm and judicial in the discussion of public questions, when he took the floor chose to make a violent attack upon this son of a gallant Union commander, a brilliant, cultured, patriotic, generous, and manly young American, who first saw the light of day after the war had closed.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that when the gentleman comes to revise those remarks (for they are not yet in the RECORD) he will not be content that the fair-minded soldiers of his district shall see that harsh, unjust, ungenerous, and unmanly criticism of the son of George B. McClellan. Here are the gentleman's remarks. I have them as taken down from his lips. Just here, Mr. Chairman, I desire to say I take it that the distinguished gentleman who presides over the deliberations of this body saw nothing in the character, education, training, or history of young McCLELLAN to unfit him for this kind of work, to wit, the work of pension legislation, or else he would not have assigned him to duty upon the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

And yet, Mr. Chairman, this man, advanced in years, who ought to be conservative, who ought to be deliberate, who ought to measure his words, who ought to know and appreciate the force of the English language, says—what, Mr. Chairman?

When I reflect upon matters that are within my memory, but are not within his, the name that he bears brings back to me the recollection of a reason why the gentleman may be presumed to be hostile to this measure and every other measure that may be introduced here for the benefit of the Federal soldier surviving the war of the rebellion.

But that is not all, Mr. Chairman. I read further from his remarks:

Because I remember, sir, in 1864, after a gentleman had been long leading a portion of the armies of the Republic and withdrew from that leadership, the next I heard of him was raising the white flag of truce and beckoning to South Carolina and her confederates—as the gentleman from New York yesterday beckoned to the gentleman from South Carolina to support him—beckoning to them and saying, "Hold on for a time, and we will help you in your work."

Here is an unmanly, ungenerous, indecorous, and unpatriotic assault upon the memory of as patriotic a soldier as ever fought in the war of the rebellion, made in the absence of Mr. McCLELLAN from the floor of this House; made not only against the memory of a deceased soldier, but made against his distinguished, manly, and high-souled son, who was born after the great surrender at Appomattox had closed the greatest epoch in American history.

Mr. Chairman, I do not mean by my earnestness in this matter to manifest any temper, ill will, or unkindness toward the gentleman from Illinois, because of these imprudent remarks; but what I do mean, Mr. Chairman, is to protest with all the vehemence of my nature against this unjust attack upon a distinguished soldier and his equally distinguished son.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there were some other things said by the gentleman from Illinois to which I might refer, but I should consume all of my time in a review of his speech if I were to attempt to do so. He undertook to give credit to the Democratic party for the Mexican war. As a Democrat, I accept the responsibility cheerfully, Mr. Chairman. I take it, however, that if Ulysses S. Grant were living he would protest against giving credit to the great men of the Democratic party alone for all the honors of Chapultepec, Buena Vista, and Monterey. But if the gentleman repudiates the honors of that war so far as the Republican party is concerned, I say to him we glory in accepting the responsibility for the making of that war, exult in the results of that great conflict, and are proud of the luster it reflects upon the pages of American history.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I want to ask the gentleman if he has read General Grant's discussion of the cause and necessity for the Mexican war in his memoirs?

Mr. MILES. There are a great many things which I have up to this time not read, but which when I shall have lived to the mature age of the gentleman from Ohio I shall have read. I find, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from Ohio has a great deal of information upon a great many subjects which I do not claim to possess. But that has nothing whatever to do with the point I was trying to make.

Mr. GROSVENOR. You were speaking about what General Grant would say, and I asked you if you had read what he did say.

Mr. MILES. What I said was that Grant would not be willing to concede that all the glories of the great battles of the Mexican war should be reckoned up by the historian as belonging to the Democratic party alone.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as to the late war, I do not want to enter into a discussion here upon that subject, for if I should do so I should fall into the same error as the gentleman from Illinois. I do not want to enter upon a discussion as to who was responsible for the making of the "late unpleasantness;" but, Mr. Chairman, when that war came on all of the soldiers of the Union Army whose careers reflected renown upon American history were not members of the Republican party. I will ask if my friend from Ohio ever heard of the distinguished volunteer soldier General Steedman?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I served on his staff, and served with him for two years.

Mr. MILES. A better Democrat never breathed the breath of life, and, I may add, the gentleman from Ohio was never before or since under more excellent leadership.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Nor a better soldier.

Mr. MILES. And no better soldier ever lived.

Mr. HEPBURN. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. MILES. I do not want to yield further.

Mr. Chairman, no general in that war ever won a more splendid victory than did Steedman at Chickamauga. But the Democratic roll in the late war is a long and illustrious one. It includes the names of Rosecrans, Sigel, Hancock, Kearny, Schofield, Slocum, George H. Thomas, Bragg, and Farragut, not to mention George B. McClellan. Referring once more, Mr. Chairman, to General McClellan's sentiments on the question of the late war, and as a better refutation to the charges made against his memory than any that I could hope to make, I shall send to the Clerk's desk his letter of acceptance of the Democratic nomination in 1864, and ask that the marked passage be read as a part of my remarks.

The Clerk read as follows:

 The effect of long and varied service in the Army during war and peace has been to strengthen and make indelible in my mind and heart the love and reverence for the Union, Constitution, laws, and flag of our country impressed upon me in early youth. These feelings have thus far guided the course of my life and must continue to do so to its end.

The existence of more than one government over the region which once owned our flag is incompatible with the peace, the power, and the happiness of the people.

The preservation of our Union was the sole avowed object for which the war was commenced. It should have been conducted for that object only and in accordance with those principles which I took occasion to declare when in active service.

Thus conducted, the work of reconciliation would have been easy, and we might have reaped the benefits of our many victories on land and sea.

The Union was originally formed by the exercise of a spirit of conciliation and compromise. To restore and preserve it the same spirit must prevail in our councils and in the hearts of the people. The reestablishment of the Union in all its integrity is and must continue to be the indispensable condition in any settlement. So soon as it is clear or even probable that our present adversaries are ready for peace, upon the basis of the Union, we should exhaust all the resources of statesmanship practiced by civilized nations and taught by the traditions of the American people, consistent with the honor and interest of the country, to secure such peace, reestablish the Union, and guarantee for the future the constitutional rights of every State. The Union is in one condition of peace—we ask no more.

Let us add what I doubt not was, although unexpressed, the sentiment of the convention as it is of the people they represent, that when any State is willing to return to the Union it should be received at once with full guaranty of all its constitutional rights.

If a frank, earnest, and persistent effort to obtain these objects should fail, the responsibility of ulterior consequences will fall upon those who remain in arms against the Union. But the Union must be preserved at all hazards.

I could not look in the face of my gallant comrades of the Army and Navy who have survived so many bloody battles and tell them that their labors and the sacrifice of so many of our slain and wounded brethren had been in vain; that we had abandoned that Union for which we have so often periled our lives. A vast majority of our people, whether in the Army and Navy or at home, would, as I would, hail with unbounded joy the permanent restoration of peace on the basis of the Union under the Constitution, without the effusion of another drop of blood. But no peace can be permanent without Union.

As to the other subjects presented in the resolution of the convention, I need only to say that I should seek in the Constitution of the United States and the laws framed in accordance therewith the rule of my duty and the limitations of executive power; endeavor to restore economy in public expenditure, reestablish the supremacy of law, and, by the operation of a more vigorous nationality, resume our commanding position among the nations of the earth.

The condition of our finances, the depreciation of the paper money, and the burdens thereby imposed on labor and capital show the necessity of a return to a sound financial system; while the rights of citizens and the rights of States and the binding authority of law over President, Army, and people, are subjects of not less vital importance in war than in peace. Believing that the views here expressed are those of the convention and the people we represent, I accept the nomination.

Mr. DINGLEY. Let me ask the gentleman, why not incorporate, in connection with this letter of acceptance, the resolution of the Democratic national convention of 1864, that declared the war a failure? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes; the second resolution of the convention.

Mr. MILES. Mr. Chairman, I want to be considerate and courteous to the distinguished gentleman from Maine, and to answer his question in a way that I believe will commend itself to his fair mind. I did not start out, sir, in a defense of the Democratic party's war history. [Applause on the Republican side.] All right, gentlemen; just hear me out. If I had time I would be delighted to compare the history of the Democratic party in peace or war with the unsavory record of the Republican party; but I could not in the few moments that are left of my time undertake a review of the history of the late unpleasantness. What I started out to do, and what I have undertaken to do, is to defend the great and good name of a distinguished Union soldier who has been charged in this debate with having beckoned to South Carolina in 1864 "to hold on for a while longer" and he would help her out in the war of the rebellion.

I say to you, sir, that there is nothing in the history of the war that is connected with the career of General McClellan and nothing in his political history that justifies the unmanly attack that has been made on his memory, now that he is sleeping beneath the sod. And the best refutation that I could make of the charge was to read his letter of acceptance of the Democratic nomination in 1864. But I must put this question aside, because, having taken the floor, in justice to myself I must address myself for a short time at least to the consideration of the pending bill.

I had hoped, sir, I had sincerely hoped, that this Committee on Invalid Pensions would bring for the consideration of this House such a bill as would command the respect, the support, and the vote of every man on both sides of this Chamber; and I believe they might have done so, and been even more liberal to the real and sure-enough soldier than they have been in the legislation proposed by the pending bill.

Mr. Chairman, for reasons which have already been well assigned by my colleague on this committee [Mr. McCLELLAN], I can not get the consent of my mind to vote for this bill, and my objections to the bill control my vote against it. In view of all that I have heard from the lips of gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber, this is very strange, because their objections to the bill are the things which seem to control their votes in favor of the bill. My distinguished friend from Illinois spoke for half an hour against certain provisions of this bill, and yet I take it he will swallow it as a whole. My distinguished friend from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] protested against the very provisions in this bill which will control my vote against it, and yet he said frankly that he would vote for the bill.

The sections to which I object are sections 13, 14, 17, 1, and 3. I shall be compelled, because of the few moments that are left me, to refer the House to the very cogent and convincing argument made by my distinguished colleague [Mr. McCLELLAN] for a statement of the reasons which cause me to object to sections 3, 14, and 17. And yet I want to say—and this is the concluding remark that I shall make—that I would forego my objections to sections 3, 14, and 17, although section 17 proposes to put upon the pension list men who are noncombatants, who never enlisted, who never saw war, and men who never received injury in battle.

Mr. PICKLER. Who?

Mr. MILES. Pilots of gunboats and men of that class.

Mr. PICKLER. Does the gentleman say that pilots never saw any service?

Mr. MILES. They saw it at a very great distance, as the gentleman understands very well. He admitted in his opening statement, which was a very strong and a very fair one, very free from that partisanship that has characterized some of his speeches here on Friday nights, and I congratulate him for it—in that opening statement he admitted that section 17 included men who were unenlisted soldiers, and that it proposed to provide for men who were unenlisted soldiers. But that is immaterial. I do not propose to stand upon sections 3, 14, and 17. Although I am a Democrat and although I am the son of a rebel, I would stand here and vote for this bill cheerfully except that you propose to place upon the pension rolls hirelings who honored no flag, who served no country, perjurers and deserters, who were true to no cause, and whose mercenary souls made them strangers to the manly impulses of patriotism. These people entertained no sentiments, Mr. Chairman, that gold would not stifle or suppress.

That is my objection to this bill. I can not stand here and give my vote to those men who, in 1864, when Confederate money was cheap, and when eighteen hundred and two thousand dollars was being paid for substitutes, seeing the money that they could make, which was good money, and seeing the cause for which they had given three years of service was certain to be a lost cause, abandoned that cause and went as hirelings, mercenaries, Hessians, to do battle for gold in company with the patriotic sons of the Union.

Oh, talk about forgiveness! It is not a question of forgiveness. Of course we all forgive them; but we owe something to the real, true, sure-enough soldiers, of whom our friend from Illinois spoke so eloquently and so much with my approval.

Mr. Chairman, everybody knows that every bounty jumper in the land will be pensioned if section 13 becomes a part of the law, and no gentleman in this debate has undertaken to dispute the fact.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have done. I have spoken without preparation and somewhat at random. I am sincerely sorry that this bill does not come to this House in such a way as to command my vote and my sincere respect. If the opportunity is allowed, I shall move to amend sections 1 and 3, and then I will cheerfully vote for the remainder of this bill.

Mr. PICKLER. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. MILES. Yes.

Mr. PICKLER. Why are you not willing to serve a Union soldier as the Government serves all other soldiers? For instance, the Mexican soldier who was drawing a pension and went into the Confederate army had his pension taken away from him for a long time. The Congress of the United States has given it back to him. It has, under the same circumstances, given back the pensions of the survivors of the Indian wars. There have been five acts of Congress forgiving these Confederate soldiers who are drawing pensions. Why not be as fair to the Union soldier as you have been to all others? We have forgiven the Confederate soldier for everything now except being a Union soldier afterwards. Are you not willing to forgive him for being a Union soldier after he has been a Confederate soldier?

Mr. MILES. I have heard the gentleman make that statement some three or four times.

Mr. PICKLER. It is a good statement, and it is true.

Mr. MILES. It has nothing whatever to do with the case.

Mr. MILNES. Let me answer that question. I can tell the gentleman from South Dakota what the difference is in my opinion.

Mr. PICKLER. I did not call upon the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. MILNES. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. MILES. I give the gentleman the floor. That is all right. I hope I have made one convert.

Mr. MILNES. The difference is that these men deserted from one service into the other.

Mr. PICKLER. No, sir; the question as to what they should suffer from having been Confederates, as I understand it.

Mr. MILNES. In the case of the Mexican soldier they did not do any such thing.

Mr. MILES. That is so clear to everybody's mind except the gentleman from South Dakota that I did not think it was worth while to state it.

Mr. PICKLER. These men were in the prisons of the North. Our officers promised them their liberty on condition of enlistment on the Union side. Those men not only risked the ordinary dangers of the Union soldier, but they risked the danger of being hanged if caught by their neighbors. These men fought against their neighbors for principle. You have forgiven every other soldier, but you are not willing to forgive the Union soldier.

Mr. MILNES. Let me ask the gentleman another question.

Mr. PICKLER. Are you a Republican?

Mr. MILNES. Yes.

Mr. PICKLER. Do not you think Harrison's Administration was friendly to the soldier? It always granted these pensions, and this Administration has taken them away.

Mr. MILNES. I am not going to indorse everything that the Harrison Administration or any other Administration did. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PICKLER. Then you are opposed to that?

Mr. MILNES. I will indorse what I believe to be right and condemn what I believe to be wrong; but the question is, what would you have thought of a Union soldier who was in Andersonville and who joined the Confederate service on a promise of his liberty?

Mr. PICKLER. Oh, well, that is going to the wrong side. These men came to the right side—they came to the Union, to the old flag—and you are trying to punish them because they became Union soldiers afterwards.

Mr. MILNES. I do not want to punish them, but I am against pensioning them.

Mr. PICKLER. The Democratic party has always been that way.

Mr. MILES. The best evidence I could possibly offer to this House of that kind of good nature which is always forgiving is the scene which gentlemen have just witnessed, in allowing these gentlemen to occupy so much of my time.

Mr. Chairman, I think I have made myself perfectly clear. I want to vote for this bill if sections 1 and 3 are stricken out. But if you do not strike those sections out, I give you notice now that we shall make splendid weapons of them in the next campaign.

Mr. PICKLER. Oh, that is all right; you have always been opposed to pensions—

Mr. MILES. Now, the gentleman knows that the statement that I have always been opposed to pensions is not true, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. PICKLER. It is, except as to soldiers whom you have put up on a pedestal, and the kind of a soldier whom you say ought to have a pension is the kind that you do not often find. I do not say that the gentleman is opposed to all pensions.

Mr. MILES. Mr. Chairman, it is a little bit strange that a man who is opposed to pensions should be so careful to maintain the pension roll as a roll of honor and a pension certificate as something else than a badge of shame! [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PICKLER. I move that the committee rise. The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DALZELL, chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 8371, and had come to no resolution thereon.

VETO MESSAGE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House a message from the President of the United States.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

I herewith return without my approval House bill No. 1004, entitled "An act granting a pension to Francis E. Hoover."

It is proposed by this bill to grant a pension of $50 a month to the beneficiary named, who served as a private for about one year and nine months in the Union Army during the war of the rebellion.

I do not understand it is claimed in any quarter that the present helpless condition of this soldier is at all attributable to his army service. He himself never applied for a pension until after the passage of the law of 1890, providing for a pension for those who had served in the Army and are unable to maintain themselves by manual labor on account of disability not chargeable to army service. The committee of the House of Representatives, in reporting this bill, declare: "The testimony does not show the disease of the soldier to be of service origin."

The beneficiary is now receiving the largest pension permitted under the law of 1890.

His condition may well excite our sympathy, but to grant him a pension of $50 a month, without the least suggestion that his pitiable disability is related to his army service, and in view of the fact that he is now receiving the highest pension allowed by a general law enacted to expressly meet such cases, it seems to me would result in an unfair discrimination as against many thousand worthy soldiers similarly situated, and would invite applications which, while difficult to refuse in the face of such a precedent, must certainly lead to the breaking down of all the limitations and restrictions provided by our laws regulating pensions.

The value of pension legislation depends as much upon fairness and justice in its administration as it does upon its liberality and generosity.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, April 25, 1896.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the bill and the veto message be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it will be so ordered. There was no objection.

HON. WILLIAM H. CRAIN.

Mr. PENDLETON. Under the order of the House eulogies were to be delivered on our deceased colleague, Mr. WILLIAM H. CRAIN, commencing at 2.30. I ask that the order be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the session on Saturday, April 25, beginning at 2.30 p. m., be devoted to the delivery of eulogies on the late W. H. CRAIN.

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. Speaker, it is well for the living to express their sorrow and to pay the tribute of respect due to those who have been our daily associates and friends, and who have before us passed over the line which is drawn between time and eternity.

It is a duty demanded by friendship, by affection, and by our common humanity; and while engaged in this duty it reminds us that we, too, are mortal; that we, too, are hastening to the grave, and that when a few more fleeting moments have passed we will be called into the presence of that Creator who has given us existence and opportunity, and to whom we are responsible for the use of the opportunities he has placed in our grasp.

We miss the genial smile, the cordial greeting, the hearty handshake of our noble friend; our hearts are sore, for many of us have known him long and well, and none knew him but to love him.

WILLIAM H. CRAIN was a native Texan, born at Galveston November 25, 1848; graduated at St. Francis Xavier College, New York, in 1867; studied law and was admitted to practice in 1871, at once taking high rank in his profession. Possessing fine natural ability, well educated, with a genial, social disposition, it was natural that he should engage in politics. True to his convictions and loyal to his friends, he drew to himself a body of earnest supporters who followed his fortunes and made him successful in every contest. He was elected first as district attorney, then State senator, and in 1884 to the Forty-ninth Congress, which place he held by successive reelections until his death.

No man can long retain friends who is unworthy of them; on the other hand, he who through a long term of years and many trying ordeals secures and holds the respect and affection of a large number of the best among his fellow-men must possess many sterling qualities.

Mr. CRAIN was a poor man; he did not possess the money-making faculty, and he was too honest to barter his convictions for sordid gain. Yet when money was needed for legitimate campaign purposes, men—prudent, calculating business men—would use their means in his behalf as freely as if he were a brother or son. No man in Texas or any other State had a more loyal, faithful constituency. When he announced his candidacy at the beginning of a political campaign it was the signal for all the loyal enthusiasm and effort of which his friends were capable.

His death brought grief to many a heart and he will long be kindly remembered by the people he served so faithfully and well.

When the news of his death was sent the grief was deep and sincere. Throughout his district (one of the largest in Texas) meetings were held at all the principal towns, and appropriate resolutions were adopted.

The Congressional committee which escorted his remains to his home was met at Houston, 200 miles distant, by a special train occupied by his friends and neighbors.

The estimate placed upon him by those who had known him longest and best can be better shown by the account of the ceremonies at his funeral and burial, taken from the San Antonio Express, which I here append as a part of my remarks:

AT REST ON THE HILLSIDE—THE LAST HONORS PAID TO CONGRESSMAN CRAIN—DISTINGUISHED VISITORS AND TWO THOUSAND PEOPLE FOLLOW THE REMAINS TO THE GRAVE—FATHER SMITH'S TRIBUTE TO THE DEAD STATESMAN—MAGNIFICENT FLORAL TRIBUTES FROM A PEOPLE IN MOURNING—BURIED IN SIGHT OF HIS HOME—DETAILS OF THE FUNERAL.

CUERO, TEX., February 14.

Tenderly and with hearts whose every pulsation was a requiem the people of Cuero today laid in the bosom of Mother Earth all that is mortal of their beloved Congressman, WILLIAM HENRY CRAIN. Upon a hillside, where his children, playing in their home, can watch over his rest, they dug his grave, and into this they softly lowered his body amid 2,000 drooping heads.

Such a tribute seldom is paid a man. It was devoid of grandeur, but rich in simple sincerity. It was a funeral in which all were mourners, a funeral in which the most lowly negro trudged feebly along behind the rich equipage, in which white and black, gray hairs and kilted tota, contributed their grief to the common woe. It was an inspiring spectacle—a lesson that must have made its impression upon everyone who saw it.

The shock which the sudden announcement of Mr. CRAIN's death caused made the people of Cuero almost insensible of their own grief. Dejectedly they hung about their stores, made mourners of their houses, and omitted no opportunity to show respect to the memory of their dead. But it was not until yesterday, as they filed slowly around his bier, and looked sadly down on the cold and rigid face they had known so well, did they become truly sensible of their grief. Since then this has been truly a town in mourning. From the moment his gray-haired mother and stricken wife were led away from the casket until this morning at 10 o'clock when the undertakers showed them aside to shut his face off forever from the light of the world, a constant stream of people wended slowly around the catafalque to take the last look. It is doubtful if a man, woman, or child in this town omitted to pay the last respects. Certainly more people than are in Cuero did this honor, for hundreds were here from a distance for this very purpose.

FLORAL TRIBUTES.

Some brought flowers to lay on his bier. Some were but small bunches of violets, dropped by a childish hand. Others were magnificent designs, which taxed the art of the florist. Scarce a variety of nature's poems was missing. They were banked up a foot high on the casket, obscuring from view all save a small space of the glass through which the kindly face was visible. Then they were placed on tables and on the piano, and finally chairs had to be brought in to hold the wealth of floral offerings. All of them were pretty, some magnificent in the elaborateness of their design, some touching in their winsome simplicity.

Two especially were very striking. One was a circle of immortelles, full 2 feet in diameter, and with a rim not less than 6 inches wide. Around the edge of the immaculate immortelles was a faint line of purple, and elevated a few inches above was a crosspiece not unlike that to an anchor. This, too, was of immortelles, and through it was "Our friend" in purple. It was an offering from the National Association of Letter Carriers, who esteemed Mr. CRAIN their especial friend because of his activity in legislation in their behalf.

Another magnificent piece was presented by Mrs. E. D. L. Wickes, of San Antonio. It was very elaborate in design. Between two long slender palms, which gracefully nodded their tips together, assuming a shape something like that of a heart, was a bank, set incline, of flowers of almost every variety. About 2 feet long and a little less in width, it represented Mr. CRAIN's desk in Congress. The outlines of the desk were marked by a border of Marshal Neil buds, nestling close to an inner border of passionate dark red roses, just opening. The body of the desk was of sprays of evergreens and pinks, and in the center an open book was formed of hyacinths and pinks. Lying diagonally across the face of the book was a broken pen, the stem being made of delicate ferns. Rising above the whole by nearly a foot was a cross formed of Marshal Neils and red buds. The whole rested on a wire frame made especially for it.

There were dozens and dozens of other designs, all of them pretentious, while there were banks of flowers tied in bunches. Among the very many offerings were handsome designs from "The Ladies of Edna," Mrs. Richard King, of Corpus Christi, Mrs. Robert Kleberg, and Mr. and Mrs. Sinclair Taliaferro, of Houston.

To add to the striking effect of the scene, three candles burned at the foot of the casket, where sat also a crucifix. The candles had been carried by three of Mr. CHAIN's sons when they made their first communion. Indeed, signs of Mr. CHAIN's religious faith were manifest everywhere, for, a consistent Catholic through life, he died surrounded by priests, and with all the rites of the church. The last sacrament was administered to him by Father Foley, of Washington, according to Mr. Corridon, his private secretary, who was with him when he died, and who bore his last messages to his stricken wife.

From the time the body was brought to the house until it was taken to the church this morning it was watched by a detail of the Merchants' Protective Hose Company, of which Mr. CHAIN used to be an active member and of which he was an honorary member at the time of his death. This privilege was granted at their own request, for each of them felt an especial affection for him.

CROWDS VIEW THE REMAINS.

Their vigil was not long, for, save during the middle hours of the night, there were always crowds coming to see the body. Early this morning before most people had breakfasted they began to come, and as the day grew, so did their numbers. Before the sun had driven the chill from the air the line reached from the street into the house.

Most of the callers this morning were out-of-town people, who had come in on the early trains and on the special from Victoria. There was an unwonted crowd on the streets, and had not a subdued air pervaded all a stranger might have thought some festival was about to begin. But as it was, this could not be thought, for it was not a moving crowd, but a crowd that gathered in knots all over town before closed doors and heavy-draped windows. Toward 9 o'clock they began to drift toward the residence where the body lay.

The residence is a big, old-fashioned two-story house, almost square, and destitute of the least fanciful design. It stands in one corner of a 2-acre lot, covered with grass. It is but a step from the church, and between the two places the sidewalks were not adequate for the crowds that passed to and fro.

Before the crowd became very large this morning the members of both fire companies in uniform took position on each side of the walk leading from the gate to the door and kept the line moving between the wall which they formed.

Among the callers about this time were Governor Culberson, accompanied by Colonel Proctor, Mr. Ed. Kauffman, internal-revenue collector of Austin, and Mr. Pleasanton, secretary of the Democratic State executive committee. State Senator Lewhon was also among the callers, as was Mr. Rudolph Kleberg, who came to look for the last time on the face of his dead partner.

Governor Culberson spent but a moment beside the body, and then stood out in the hall until the members of the Congressional escort arrived. They wore long white silk sashes, hung diagonally from their shoulders, with black rosettes at the shoulder and where they crossed at the button. They also wore white silk gloves, and these, with glossy silk tiles and long broadcloth Prince Alberts, made a striking uniform. When they arrived Undertaker Zurhorst, of Washington, who directed the ceremonies, pinned sashes on Governor Culberson and Colonel Proctor, and they were among the honorary pallbearers. The members of the Cuero Turn Verein, with their silk banner heavily draped in black, arrived in a body and passed around the casket. Then, it being just 10 o'clock, the cover was screwed on the glass plate and the face of WILLIAM HENRY CHAIN was shut from view forever. The flowers which had covered it were taken off, revealing a plain but rich casket covered with heavy velvet. Save for the ornamentation of the massive silver handle pieces, there was no decoration. On the middle was a heavy silver plate on which was engraved:

WILLIAM HENRY CHAIN.

November 25, 1843.

February 10, 1896.

The active pallbearers were Charles Breeding, Joseph Rice, Dr. W. R. Babbhorne, John McDonald, Jeff Baker, and Joseph Sheppard, all of whom live in Cuero. These gently lifted the casket and bore it to the waiting hearse, to which were hitched four handsome black horses.

When the body was deposited in the hearse the members of the fire company marched ahead and took a position in front. The honorary pallbearers divided on each side of the hearse. Next, in carriages, were Mr. CHAIN's mother, his sister-in-law, and Judge Mitchell, of Victoria, and his five children. Mrs. Chain did not attend either at the church or the grave, she being completely prostrated. Probably a thousand others fell in behind, and thus they marched slowly to the church.

SERVICES AT THE CHURCH.

The big crowd which was standing outside the church, being unable to get admission, opened a passageway, and when the procession was in closed up and wholly hid it from view.

At the entrance the casket was met by Bishop Forest and five surpliced priests, with crucifix, font, and censor.

"I am the resurrection and the life," announced the arrival of the corpse, and simultaneously from the deep, solemn voice of the pipe organ came the dirge. Slowly up the aisle, following the praying clergy, the casket was borne and placed in front of the altar. Save that the altars and chancel were dressed in midnight black, the church was not draped. High above the altar, though, rested the floral piece which Mrs. Wickes had sent. The relatives took the front seats on the left of the aisle and the pallbearers were immediately opposite.

Then the crowd was admitted until the church was full, when the doors were closed, leaving a thousand outside.

Requiem mass differs from high mass scarcely in any detail except that the music is very solemn, being sung almost in dirge time. The Credo, Kyrie, and Offertory are sung, but not the Gloria. Father Wyr, of St. Joseph's College, Victoria, was the celebrant; Father Kline, of St. Edward's, Austin, was the deacon; Father Gerlach, of Myersville, subdeacon, and Father Moczygambi, of Pana Maria, master of ceremonies. Bishop Forest sat on the gospel side of the altar with Father Shehan, pastor of the church. Bishop Forest blessed the corpse and gave the benediction.

When the service had been concluded Father Smith, of San Antonio, robed only in a black cassock, with a crucifix in his belt, stepped to the front of the altar and spoke of the dead.

"Death is an unwelcome visitor," he said, "and, unbidden, enters every rank of life. It respects neither the righteous nor the wicked, neither rich nor poor, and so audacious is it that one day it assailed Calvary and did not come down until it had given the fatal blow to God himself, made man. Here before us to-day we have evidence of his visit.

"Among men there is an unbounded ambition. From birth they seek to attain the influential positions of life. Many aspire to the legislature of their country or of their State, and not a few as editors of newspapers aspire to lead the thought of men and mold the opinion of the public. From the newspaper men we expect that they shall strive to widen and uplift our thoughts. To the legislators the people look for such laws as will conduce to their happiness, and the one who seeks to rule by laws and enactments must, if he be successful, give heed to the higher laws of God.

"The deceased was one who considered the responsibilities of public life.

In yonder years, when he thought he was destined for public usefulness, he knocked at the door of the Catholic Church and asked to be admitted among her children. He was soon convinced that she who had witnessed the down-fall and rise of so many people, who for so long a time had governed men and had assisted nations in regaining their lost prestige, had a true sense of liberty, which means to do the greatest good to the greatest number. She told him that there was a God, that there was a Christ, the Son of God. She told him that there were two powers independent in their spheres—the spiritual and the physical. She told him also of the necessity of making use of this world for the other, of the use of reason and religion. She told him all this and he accepted it, and those who may have listened to his reasons for joining that church know that, as he frequently said to himself, he was a 'convicted Catholic.' He was a convinced Catholic, and, my dear friends, he took the teachings which he had received from the church and brought them into the public arena, and became not only a Catholic but an American, feeling himself at home anywhere in this country. He was not afraid to say that he was an American, and his loyalty to the church did not suffer. Never did he forget that he was a Catholic American.

"A Catholic American the deceased was, and as I have promised not to delay you long I can not better illustrate what I have said than to recall to your mind the last speech which he uttered in the halls of Congress. It was on a bill making an appropriation for charitable purposes. The peroration must still ring in your ears. Once more he brought the antagonistic armies on the fields of thirty years ago face to face. You saw them fight; you saw them fall dead and wounded, and on these fields of carnage he showed you the sisters of Charity—white-winged ministers of God's mercy—going about the fields holding a cup of cold water to some parched lips, dressing the wounds of some prostrate soldier, praying beside some fallen boy, and closing in death the eyes of those who had been killed. In that peroration—in that speech—you can see the Catholic, who, fast in the faith of the church, teaches wisdom and love of country. You can see likewise the statesman applying the Constitution of his country, which demands justice for all.

"I will conclude by asking what he is unable to ask now. We have a soul; so had he, but it is now in eternity, and he realizes, no doubt, now the truth of the doctrines of the Catholic Church, and one of them was prayer for the dead. And to-day and hereafter, when his name comes to your memory, do not forget to say: 'O Lord, have mercy on the Honorable WILLIAM HENRY CHAIN, the Catholic American Congressman.'"

Then Bishop Forest passed twice around the casket, once sprinkling it with holy water and once with the censor. Then the pallbearers lifted the body, and, following Bishop Forest and five robed priests, they placed it in the hearse and it was borne to the cemetery.

AT THE CEMETERY.

The cemetery is about half a mile from the church, on a hillside, and in view of the house which was the dead Congressman's home. The procession en route passed quite in front of where his widow lay sick of grief. The order of march was the same as that from the house to the church, except that the honorary pallbearers rode in carriages immediately behind the hearse. The line extended almost from the church to the cemetery. Fully two-thirds of those who were at the cemetery went afoot.

The ceremony at the grave was very brief, consisting of Latin chants. When these had been sung Bishop Forest and each of the priests threw a spadeful of earth into the grave. Then the active pallbearers, hats in hand, fell singly around the grave, and as each passed the head he pulled off the crape from his arm and dropped it into the grave.

The firemen followed, dropping crape and bunches of evergreen, which they carried. Then came the honorary pallbearers, the Congressional escort, and as they passed the head of the grave they pulled the white silk gloves from their hands and dropped them onto the casket.

Then the flowers, of which there was an immense pile, were thrown in, and lastly four strong men covered the whole with earth and piled it up high to mark the last resting place of WILLIAM HENRY CHAIN.

A TRIBUTE TO CHAIN.

AUSTIN, TEX., February 11.

Out of respect to the memory of the late WILLIAM HENRY CHAIN, whose remains were to-day consigned to the grave in the cemetery at Cuero, the flags on the State capitol and the Federal building have been flying at half mast. No member of the Texas delegation in Congress was more popular in Austin than Mr. CHAIN, and the news of his death came to his Austin friends like a clap of thunder in a clear sky. Generous, impulsive, and brilliant, his was a life that shone like some majestic star, dimming those around it by its matchless luster, while his genius charmed and cast a spell on all who came beneath its influence. Borne where the ocean's roar made the first music for his infant ears, he seemed to catch that inspiration from the boundless deep which moved to mighty deeds.

The S. B. Prentiss of the South, he knew not what fear meant when duty called, for his was the courage of a Richard Coeur de Lion and the spirit of a Henry of Navarre. But "he is now at rest, and praise and blame fall on his ear alike, now cold in death." No more will his voice charm with its magic or arouse with its eloquence, and to-day when the grave received all that was mortal of this mighty statesman, this matchless orator, this friend of liberty, this genial, generous, and impulsive man, all nature sighed and a shadow crossed the sun. "Yes, thou art gone, gone like a star, that through the firmament shot and was lost, in its eccentric course dazzling, perplexing," and

Look where we may, yet we will look in vain,
To find thy likeness, O immortal CHAIN!

A FRIEND.

EAGLE PASS'S ACTION.

EAGLE PASS, TEX., February 13.

The citizens of Eagle Pass, irrespective of party, met at the court-house last night to express the sentiments of this community on the untimely death of the Hon. W. H. CHAIN, once its honored Representative.

Judge Winchester Kelso was elected chairman and Maj. S. M. Simmons secretary.

After eulogistic remarks on the rare ability and charming personality of deceased, the following committee was appointed to draft resolutions expressing the sentiments of the meeting: J. M. Goggin, J. O. Williamson, W. Kelso, W. A. Fitch, A. H. Evans, and C. W. Hartup.

The committee afterwards presented the following resolutions, which were unanimously adopted:

"Resolved, First, that this community has heard with profound sorrow of the death of our former Representative, the Hon. W. H. CHAIN.

"Second. That in the death of the Hon. W. H. CHAIN Texas has lost one of her noblest and best sons and a nation one of her ablest and wisest lawmakers.

"Third. That the sympathies of this entire community go out to the family of the deceased.

"Fourth. That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to the family of the deceased and to the press."

While he was sincere in his political opinions and bold in asserting them, he never unnecessarily wounded the feelings of those who differed with him, and among his political opponents he numbered some of his best personal friends. The Republican convention in Arkansas County adopted the resolutions which I here append:

Be it resolved by the Republicans of Arkansas County in convention assembled, That in the death of the Hon. WILLIAM HENRY CRAIN the citizenship of southwest Texas has lost a most polished, worthy, and able representative; that the Republicans of this district share and feel that loss, and join with their Democratic friends in mourning the demise of one of Democracy's brightest minds and one of Republicanism's most honorable and talented foes; that a copy of this resolution be furnished the press of the State, and as a mark of our respectful sympathy the secretary is also instructed to transmit a copy to the family of the deceased.

He left to mourn his loss a wife, one of the purest and noblest women who ever blessed a home, and seven children, all bright and sensible, but most of them too young to battle with the world. The grief-stricken mother must not only bear her burden of woe, but must also take the place of both parents.

Our friend had his faults, and no man more regretted and deplored them. None of us is exempt. "To err is human."

No further seek his merits to disclose,
Nor draw his frailties from their dread abode;
There they alike in trembling hope repose,
The bosom of his Father and his God.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, the last speech Mr. CRAIN made and the very last words he uttered in this House illustrate two traits in his character which it must please his friends to recall.

"The Speaker will take care of me" were his last spoken words on this floor, evidently in response to some suggestion of a fellow-member not recorded, and they evince that courteous respect for authority, coupled with that gentle manliness which was characteristic of him under all circumstances.

His last speech was for the charitable institutions of the District of Columbia. In it he begged us to remember those whose tender hands had cooled the fevered brows of our brave soldiers after the disasters of the battlefields, and who are now devoting their lives to comforting the afflicted, feeding the hungry, and harboring the homeless. He endeavored to inspire us with the gratitude that was burning so intensely in his heart and to impart to us a compassion for the unfortunate as deep as his own.

These qualities, with others his friends will well remember, bring him so near the great English thinker's estimate of a gentleman that I may be pardoned for quoting his words. It was Ruskin who said that "a gentleman's first characteristic is that of fineness of structure in the body which renders it capable of the most delicate sensation, and of structure in the mind which renders it capable of the most delicate sympathies—one may say fineness of nature. That is, of course, compatible with heroic bodily strength and mental firmness. In fact, heroic strength is not conceivable without such delicacy. Elephantine strength may drive its way through a forest and feel no touch of the boughs, but the white skin of Homer's Atrides would have felt a bent rose leaf yet subdue its feeling in glow of battle and behave itself like iron."

Who that saw his manly form and knew its sensitive nature; who that felt the generous warmth of his friendship, his uniform courtesy, the brilliance of his mental make-up and his tender sympathies can fail to appreciate in his memory the man and the gentleman.

I will leave to those who knew him longer—who are more familiar with his political career—the opportunity to dwell on the causes of his success. Yet it is proper to recall the fact that he pursued his college career in a college situated within the limits of the district which I have the honor to represent, and while there he lived in the neighborhood where I have spent my life.

When we heard of his nomination for Congress in far-away Texas—his home State—we felt as keen an interest in his success as might any of his constituents, for while with us in the years when he was budding into manhood, when he was developing his best qualities of mind and heart, he became endeared to us, and when he bade us farewell he left behind him a reputation for brightness of mind and cleanness of heart and generosity of soul which earned for him our ardent wishes for his future happiness and prosperity, and up to the very hour of his death we have been far from indifferent to his success.

We looked, in the nature of things, for a longer life, but the Almighty Providence, whose wisdom none will question, decreed the contrary.

For his friends in New York who were the companions of his early manhood I pay this last tribute of respect to his memory.

For myself I can only say that my association with him here was more than agreeable—and all too short. If there were any faults in his character they lie buried with his body beneath the "sacred grass and the saddened flowers."

His charming personality, his scholarly attainments, his noble soul, his generous impulses, his tender sympathies, and his brightness of mind will live in our memories as the characteristics which we honored and loved in him and which should endure.

May he rest in peace.

Mr. COOPER of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I shall not attempt any set speech or any formal eulogy of WILLIAM H. CRAIN. I wish merely to utter a few words, however inadequate, expressive of the esteem and the admiration which I feel for many of the qualities of the man. No one could come in contact with him without appreciating the fact that he was a cultivated gentleman. His manners were graceful, easy, simple, and unaffected. They came, as the best manners always do, from the heart within the man. One of his most notable characteristics was generosity. He was generous not merely in pecuniary matters, but generous of his time, generous of his information, generous of efforts for others, generous in all his intercourse with his associates and his fellow-men. Another admirable quality of the man was frankness. Whatever faults he had were apparent to all. He wore his heart upon his sleeve. There was naught of hypocrisy in his make-up. He possessed a fine mind, highly cultivated. He had as wide a fund of general information as most men in this House, and upon some special subjects he possessed as deep and as accurate information as any man on this floor, if not more. I did not know him as long as many here. My acquaintance with him began in the Fifty-third Congress, but I knew him long enough to appreciate many of his attractive, high, and noble qualities.

He was a man of sincere religious convictions, deeply attached to his church. Like most men who have mingled much with the world, its temptations, and its distractions, he may not always have reached his own ideal in a strict following of his own religious convictions, but his reverence for them was always deep and sincere. The last speech he made upon the floor of this House was in their defense, and among the last words he uttered was a deeply touching tribute to those pure and lovely devotees and ministrants of religion, the sisterhoods of the Catholic Church; and, indeed, it is a matter of sincere gratification to his friends to know that in his last hours he had the ministrations and the consolations of his religion. But words avail not; he is gone. May earth rest lightly and the grass grow green above him, for it is a noble heart that sleeps beneath.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose to detail the various incidents which collectively constitute the life history of the late member of this body whose memory we have met here to-day to honor. Of his biography others who have already spoken, or who may yet speak, are more competent to give account. Suffice it for me to say that, contrary to popular impression, the men who have made the most valuable contributions to the welfare of the human race, the men whose lives have most strongly influenced the current of contemporary history—the really great men of the world—were not always, perhaps not generally, those whose lives contained the most remarkable incident, the most sensational episode, the most wonderful vicissitude.

Our brother is gone. "The dull, cold ear of death" shall be his till it responds to the great roll call of the ages in the hour of the last judgment. Nothing that we may say or leave unsaid here to-day can or will be heard or recognized by him. Therefore we speak not to the dead but to the living.

The life of our departed friend and fellow-legislator offers us some useful lessons to be applied in the shaping out of our own personal life work.

Born a Texan, he spent his whole life among the people of his native State, and was at one time the only native-born Texan in her delegation in the National Congress. Though a part of his youth was spent in the commercial metropolis of America, surrounded by all the alluring attractions of the most advanced civilization of the Western World, yet he exhibited the sturdiness of his patriotism and love for his native State by returning to her borders at the close of his collegiate career and engaging in the arduous and exacting labors of his profession, which ultimately brought him distinction among his people. While he might have imitated the example of many others by yielding to the blandishments of life in the progressive East, and might have thus secured a high measure of success amid its gayer and richer environment, he preferred to cast his lot with his people in the lonely and sparsely settled plains of the Gulf Coast; and there he helped them to build the foundations of that great Commonwealth whose progress has awakened the admiration and yet excited the apprehension of the older States of the East, and whose wonderful growth has threatened their political supremacy.

As he made his home, by choice, with the poor and humble (though proud, brave, and adventurous) settlers in a new land, where ambition and self-interest could find little food for hope; so he was always a consistent exponent of that high chivalry that pleads for the helpless, champions the fallen, and gives its sympathy and effort to those who are needy rather than to those who are able to repay with interest. In him the poor found a friend, the destitute a benefactor, the oppressed a defender. These are the qualities that appeal most strongly to the hearts of the masses. Xerxes, panoplied in golden armor, attended by a congress of subservient and tributary kings, and surrounded by all the paraphernalia and proofs of earthly power, might well excite the wonder or even the admiration of the world of warriors that gathered around him as he stood upon the shores of the Bosphorus in the long ago and claimed dominion over the two continents that its waters divided; but the picture of Stonewall Jackson, sleeping on a tattered blanket in a tentless field and rising at morn to share in the breakfast of corn bread and rye coffee that constituted the fare of his poorest soldiers—that submergence of self in the service of a great cause—reaches at once to the hearts of his followers on the fields of blood and his admirers throughout the world wherever men read history and admire unselfishness. Whatever else may be said of democracy, whatever other deductions may be made from its workings, we must concede that where it truly exists no man can long retain high public station unless he possess some of the great qualities that entitle men to success. Our deceased friend easily kept his place in this body and in the affections of his people, year after year, campaign after campaign, and the secret of his popularity was his brilliancy of thought, his eloquence of speech, his magnetic influence, and his chivalric character. In this day of greed and selfishness this is no mean tribute to the memory of any man when measured by the higher standards of human worth.

In addition to his nobler qualities of mind and heart, our friend had his weaknesses, as who of us—who, anywhere—has not? It is neither true to fact nor any particular honor to the dead to deny, after death, those frailties that the dead themselves did not and would not deny or extenuate while living. He who would teach us that our deceased friend had no weaknesses, felt no temptations, stumbled not in his march through the allurements of life, would lift him at once above the plane of mortal men and above that sympathy which the world is ever ready to accord to the noble, struggling, yielding, suffering weak. Of our departed friend, it might well be said:

Is it true, O Christ in heaven,
That the strongest suffer most?
That the noblest wander farthest,
And most hopelessly are lost?

But for him let it be said that it is a grander triumph for the man of warm and generous impulses to walk, even with uncertain and stumbling steps, than it is for the cold, cynical, unfeeling man to pursue the path of right without deviation, because his icy nature makes him incapable of temptation. It is one of the most beautiful, because one of the most comforting, thoughts connected with Christian theology that when all the individuals of the human race shall be convened in one mighty throng around the throne of God at the last judgment we shall all be judged by One who "took upon himself our weaknesses and bore our infirmities." One who trod in the footsteps of our erring life, and who, though He yielded not to temptation even when offered all the kingdoms of this world, yet knew from experience the power of the influences that entice men away from the right.

If, then, we hope to enjoy charity of judgment from the Son of Man when our life work shall be unrolled before the gaze of Omniscience, how much more meet is it that with none but loving hands and broad charity should we lift the veil that covers from the eyes of the world the frailties of our dead brother? Without seeking to deny or minimize his shortcomings, let us speak of them in tones of sympathy and regret, and with a felt, even if unspoken, prayer that we may profit by his errors and be saved from the inherited weaknesses of our own natures.

While our friend may not have attained international celebrity, let us not conclude that his life was not a success. The true measure of success is the work that we do for the generations to come, for posterity, for humanity. He has not lived in vain who has filled the full measure of his opportunity, who has justly exercised his means of serving his fellow-man, who has contributed something to the progress and happiness of humanity. In the laboriously framed fabric of national greatness, woven and interwoven with the threads of complicated purposes, conflicting interests, and mutual concession, no one man's work is easily separated from that of his fellows. Where so many have contributed to a nation's greatness and a nation's glory it is difficult to mete out to each actor his proportionate share of credit for what it is or blame for what it is not; but the statutes of this country and the personal observation of many members of this body show that our friend and fellow-legislator played no unimportant part in the accomplishment of much that was and is good. His eloquent voice was heard and his personal vote and general influence were cast for what he believed to be the greatest good of his people and his country. Along the stream of his life work lie no stupendous cataraacts whose reverberations tell the world he lived; but the current of his influence moved quietly and steadily on toward the achievement of his aim—the ocean of his country's glory and greatness.

Let us honor our dead by imitating his fidelity to trust and his chivalry of soul. Let us utilize his life even in his death, by drawing from it lessons that may ennoble our own lives. Duty above selfishness, the use for the public good of the opportunities given us by the voice of the people—let these be our aims. And in the execution of these high aims may we find in our entire consecration to public duty the surest safeguard against the temptations that beset him and us, and as a result of this consecration may we secure the highest reward attainable for duty well performed—the approbation of conscience and the deserved applause of the people we are here to represent.

Mr. BELL of Texas. Mr. Speaker, we to-day pay tribute to the memory of one who has been called from among us in the full vigor of matured manhood, and who it might reasonably have been expected would have been spared to his family, his friends, and his country for many years. He had already accomplished much, but apparently he had barely reached the beginning of the broader career of usefulness and honor for which he seemed destined and for which he was so well fitted.

The beginning of my personal acquaintance with Mr. CRAIN was of recent date, but I had long known of him as one of the gifted sons of his native State, upon which he reflected so much credit, whom all delighted to honor, and in whose well-earned triumphs we took a just pride.

At an age at which most lawyers are regarded as mere tyros in the profession Mr. CRAIN became the prosecuting attorney of his district, and by his courteous demeanor, his fair and honorable conduct, and the vigorous and eminently successful manner in which he discharged the duties incumbent upon him he established himself in the confidence and esteem and gained a hold upon the affection of the people of his section of the State which was never impaired.

As a State senator he soon became widely known as a man of dauntless courage, of tireless energy, of unquestionable integrity, of excellent judgment, and as the most eloquent speaker and readiest debater among the young leaders who were then forging to the front; and it was not strange that the members of his political party, which had suffered defeat in his Congressional district at the previous election, should have turned instinctively to him as the one person whom they preferred to have bear their banner, and to whom they were willing to intrust the task of restoring their supremacy. He was nominated without opposition as the candidate of his party, and was triumphantly elected a member of the Forty-ninth and of each succeeding Congress.

Of his work here much has been and more might be said. The courtly manners and chivalrous courtesy which had characterized him in all the walks of life, the felicity with which he could express himself in debate, his pleasing address and happy faculty of forming acquaintances and making friends, soon caused Mr. CRAIN to become one of the best and most favorably known members of this body.

Why he should have been called away in the very prime of life we can not understand. We can only deplore his loss and extend to his bereaved wife and fatherless children our sympathy. While we realize that no words of ours can—it will be some consolation to them to know that others share with them their sorrow; that others who knew him far from home and kindred had learned to love him and that they cherish his memory.

To us, the comrades in his labors, his sudden and unexpected death should teach a solemn lesson. We are reminded that we, too, must respond to the summons to join the innumerable caravan, and that we should prepare for a higher, nobler, better, and eternal life.

Mr. EDDY. Mr. Speaker, "In the midst of life we are in death." The truth of the quotation just given was never more strikingly illustrated than in the fate of the man to whose memory we to-day do honor.

One day standing in his place on the floor of this House, in the full flush of vigorous manhood, his voice ringing forth like a clarion in proclamation of what he believed was right, justice, and for the best interests of humanity, the next report was in-wafted upon the unwilling ears of his associates here that he was in the grasp of fell disease, and yet the next and the black, somber draping of his accustomed seat, surmounted by a white wreath of flowerets, symbolical of hope, proclaimed to us in language impressively eloquent by its very silence that the stalwart frame was cold in death, that the eloquent voice was for aye hushed, and that the immortal spirit of WILLIAM HENRY CRAIN had passed from the brief here into the never-ending hereafter, and that as a fellow-mortal in earthly avocation we should meet and greet him no more forever.

The story of his life's vicissitudes is eventful and interesting, but I leave its recital to those who were more intimately associated with him in his career than I.

He was a leader among men, but the task of describing his great qualities of leadership I leave to those who have followed where he led in the great battle of politics.

He was an orator bounteously endowed by nature with matchless powers of eloquence, ripened almost into perfection by years of training and experience in public life, but to those who have many times and often listened to his ringing sentences I leave the task of describing his wonderful abilities and powers as an orator.

The Hon. WILLIAM HENRY CRAIN was to me a stranger. In the brief time we were associates on the floor of this House I never had the honor of addressing to him a single word in conversation or of grasping his hand in an introductory clasp.

But scenes and pictures oftentimes appear upon the panorama of passing events that enable a stranger instantaneously to judge the character of a fellow-stranger in certain lines better, far better and more accurately, than a lifetime of intimate acquaintance would enable him to judge, and such an opportunity was afforded me to so judge him.

The only public utterance that I ever heard WILLIAM HENRY CRAIN make was when he stood up in his place and such a vivid word picture of battle painted that we could hear the rattle of the drums, the blare of the trumpet, the shrill notes of the bugle, and the scream of the life cheering men on to carnage, and the deep resonant tones of commanding officers as they urged their men to stand firm.

So vivid was the picture that we could see long lines of infantry marching and countermarching; could see the smoke of their muskets and hear the whistle of bullets as they sped on their mission of death.

We could see batteries of artillery gallop into position with almost automatic precision, could hear the reverberating roar of the pieces as they belched forth their awful missiles of annihilation, hear the rattle of grape and canister, the crash of solid shot, and the wild shriek of the shell.

Spellbound by his magic eloquence we saw the charging squadrons of horsemen meet in battle shock, and could hear the very clash of steel as saber clanked against saber in the terrible music of death.

Then with the hand of a master he shifted the scenes, and we beheld with horror the awful ravages of war after deadly battle, where Americans had met Americans on the red field of conflict in fratricidal strife, and by the pale moonlight, so vivid was the description, could we see rows upon rows of dead warriors and thousands of shot-torn, saber-slashed, mangled, and wounded fellow-men lying on the carnage-swept field.

Then his voice sank into the pathos of inexpressible tenderness as he described, with such startling reality that before our eyes we could see them there, the black-robed sisters, ministering angels of the church he loved so well—fitting to and fro among the stricken ones, closing the eyes of the dead, moistening the lips of the dying and bandaging the torn and mangled with women's tender fingers—black-robed sisters, with vision keen as eagle's to discover suffering, but with eyes so stricken with the color-blindness of heavenly charity that they were utterly unable to discover whether the recipients of their kindly ministrations wore the gray of the Confederacy or the blue of the Union.

And when he closed with splendid peroration, the curtains of his secret soul were rolled away and a grand and noble trait of character stood revealed in WILLIAM HENRY CRAIN, the most godlike trait that mortal man can possess—a deep and abiding love for his fellow-man and a boundless sympathy for oppressed humanity.

And when the funeral train, bearing all that was mortal of the Congressman, speeding southward, reached the borders of his native State, evidences of his love and sympathy for his fellow-man multiplied, for love and sympathy always beget love and sympathy in return, and the uncovered crowds that watched the cortege pass by bore upon their faces that wan and disconsolate expression that one sees upon the faces of those who stand by the grave of a friend.

And when we reached the beautiful city of Cuero, his home for many years, the throng of people that so sadly awaited our arrival bore upon their faces that look of sad and desolate loneliness that one sees upon the face of one who has lost one dearer than a friend.

Loving hands bore him from the funeral train to his modest residence, and there in state he lay; and multitudes of people—white, black, rich, poor, of all conditions of life—old men and women tottering on staves, men and women in life's autumn time, husbands and wives in the full vigor of noontide existence, youths and maidens, little children led by the hand—came to look once more and for the last time upon the features of him they had loved and honored. No idle motive of curiosity prompted them thus to come. Grief—deep, all-pervading grief—was the impelling force that moved them to look again upon him they loved so well in life. Sorrow, heartfelt sorrow, was everywhere manifest, and the tears of those who knew him longest and knew him best that that day fell upon his casket constituted a eulogy more eloquent than mortal lips can utter.

And as I gazed upon the sorrow-stricken features of those who stood around his bier the beautiful poem of Leigh Hunt came to my mind:

About Ben Adhem (may his tribe increase!)
Awoke one night from a deep dream of peace,
And saw within the moonlight of his room,
Making it rich, and like a lily in bloom,
An angel writing in a book of gold.
Exceeding peace had made Ben Adhem bold,
And to the presence in the room he said:
"What writest thou?" The vision raised its head,
And, with a look made all of sweet accord,
Answered, "The names of those who love the Lord."
"And is mine one?" asked About. "Nay, not so,"
Replied the angel. About spoke more low,
But cheerily still, and said: "I pray thee, then,
Write me as one who loves his fellow-men."
The angel wrote and vanished. The next night
It came again with a great wakening light
And showed the names of those whom love of God had blest,
And lo! Ben Adhem's name led all the rest.

I would not have you think that WILLIAM HENRY CRAIN was a man perfect. No doubt he had failings many, for he was mortal. No doubt he had faults numerous, for he was, like us, human. But when I saw the fond remembrance in which he was held by friends and neighbors, I doubted not but that in God's great ledger, the only account books where mistakes are never made and where errors never creep in, over against the name of WILLIAM HENRY CRAIN, written in letters of brightest gold, were the words: "He loved his fellow-men."

After brief but impressive services in the church where, with wife and loved ones, he oft had worshiped, he was borne, sadly borne, to burial. Deep in the bosom of his much-loved State they laid him down to rest and to await the Archangel's summons. Peace, peace to his ashes.

No stately column need be raised to perpetuate his memory among the sons of Texas or their descendants.

In the hearts of Texans has he left a monument much more lasting than marble tomb or time-enduring granite shaft.

Mr. McDEARMON. Mr. Speaker, it was not my privilege to enjoy an intimate social acquaintance with the distinguished gentleman whose life and character we are considering. I had the honor to serve with him in the Fifty-third Congress and until his death in this, but my personal associations with him did not extend beyond a passing acquaintance and a few casual conversations. I was, however, attracted by his courtly bearing, knightly courtesy, and distinguished mien upon my first entrance into this body as a member, and I soon discovered that he was one of the leading spirits of the exceptionally able body of men, as a whole, who composed the membership of this House in the Fifty-third Congress. His commanding appearance, melodious voice, polished manner, vigorous and impassioned but faultlessly classical language, his clear, logical, and forceful arguments always commanded the closest attention of the House, challenging the respect of his political opponents, the delight and pride of his friends, and the admiration and applause of all. Mr. CRAIN was, in the true sense of the word, an orator. He possessed a vivid and towering imagination. His mind had been well trained in his early youth, and when I first knew him it had become richly laden with varied and valuable information. He had drunk deep at the fountain of knowledge and was endowed with its rarest fruits. His ability to clothe the most commonplace thoughts in the choicest rhetoric was striking and remarkable. His long experience as a member of this body and his familiarity with public affairs, coupled with his general information, enabled him to bear a leading and honorable part in all of the great discussions which made the Fifty-third Congress memorable.

He never failed to illumine any subject which he debated or to instruct and enlighten his hearers with his incisive and lucid arguments or to entrance them with his matchless eloquence. While my social intercourse with him was limited, as I have stated, yet I recall several little incidents with which he was connected which gave me an insight into his character, which, together with what I have learned about him since his death, convinced me that he was a man of the most scrupulous integrity and chivalric honor; and that his lofty soul was incapable of a low thought or an ignoble act.

He impressed me as being a man of superb moral and physical courage; a high-spirited, cultured, dignified, and accomplished gentleman in every sense of that too-often abused term. When the proceedings of this House were interrupted last February by the solemn and startling announcement that WILLIAM H. CRAIN, who had so recently been an active and prominent participant in the discussion of the grave questions which then engaged our attention, was dead, that he had been suddenly cut down in the prime of his splendid manhood, had journeyed to that "undiscovered country from whose bourn no traveler returns," we had another and a deeply impressive reminder and admonition that we are all sojourners here, and that sooner or later we, too, must lay down our life's work, whether finished or unfinished, perchance as abruptly and unexpectedly as did he.

I was unusually shocked by the announcement of Mr. CRAIN'S death, and was very soon thereafter designated as one of the committee appointed by the Chair to escort his remains to his far-off home in southern Texas.

Our long, sad journey on the funeral train, deeply draped in the gloomy habiliments of death, in its rapid flight through the great Commonwealths of Old Virginia, the two Carolinas, Georgia, Alabama, Louisiana, and Texas, ever and anon flitting past historic spots where in the not long ago great armies of Americans contended in bloody strife with brother Americans; the lamentations of the stricken widow and orphans; the sweetly solemn and peculiarly impressive ceremonies and sermon by the Catholic clergy in the church where he was accustomed to worship, and by the open grave on the hillside where we left our brother asleep, all conspired to awaken in my mind the deepest emotions of sympathy for those who wept, and to lead me to contemplate the life and character of him whose remains it became my sad duty to help to bury. The many noble traits of character and many attributes which characterized our departed brother have been lovingly described and eloquently portrayed by his distinguished colleagues, whose good fortune it was to know him as a companion and to love him as a friend. His brilliant achievements as a statesman and valuable public services to his State and to the nation during his long and honorable career as a member of this House have been graphically and faithfully recounted by those who served with him from his advent into public life, and who witnessed his labors and rejoiced at his glorious triumphs.

But his votes and public utterances are transcribed in the imperishable archives of the several Congresses in whose proceedings he took part. They belong to his country and are a part of its heritage, and will be interwoven into its glorious history. In all of the important measures which have engaged the attention of Congress during the last twelve years, many of which have materially affected the welfare and destiny of our country, his influence has been felt and his voice has been heard in advocacy of the right and in condemnation of the wrong. I doubt whether the speeches of any other of the many able and eloquent statesmen whose footprints are interspersed through the volumes of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD will, in beauty and purity of diction, rhetorical graces and polish, together with vigorous arguments and sound logic, surpass those of WILLIAM H. CRAIN. Generations that are to follow will take our places when we are gone and will pass impartial judgment upon his actions and ours by the transcript of our spoken words and registered votes as we leave them upon record.

Mr. CRAIN has had his entrance and his exit. His gentle spirit which made others happier by its charming influence came upon earth, dwelt among men for a brief season, and departed as mysteriously as it came.

The light of his genius dazzled and bewitched us during his sojourn, and when it was extinguished the world seemed darker for a time.

He was fondly loved by those who knew him intimately. Throngs of his constituents and friends from far and near, including the governor of the State and his staff, came on special trains to testify of their grief and to mourn at the grave of their friend and leader. The entire population of his home, the beautiful and picturesque city of Cuero, paid affectionate tribute to his memory by attending en masse his funeral, while many tears and sobs testified that true hearts sincerely mourned the death of one they fondly loved. I feel, Mr. Speaker, that this House has lost a valuable and able member, the country a loyal and patriotic citizen, and the world a noble man by the death of WILLIAM H. CRAIN. I reverently offer this poor tribute to his memory.

Peace to his ashes.

Mr. MILNES. Mr. Speaker, it became my sad duty, by your appointment, to accompany the remains of the Hon. WILLIAM H. CRAIN to their last resting place, to his home in Texas, there to be given a Christian burial among his relatives and friends, and I have now been asked to submit a few remarks in respect to his memory. It was not my pleasure to be intimately acquainted with our deceased brother. In fact, I never had the pleasure of being formally introduced to him, and therefore can say but little of his personality, as can those who knew him well and were his associates in his long and honorable career in this body.

That he was a man of great learning and ability, ever ready to serve his constituents and fight manfully for their rights, is fully evidenced by the official records of this House.

That his services were duly appreciated by his constituents his return to Congress for so many consecutive terms fully testifies.

One of the best things that can be said of any man is that those who knew him best—those among whom he was born and grew up to manhood, those among whom and with whom he has spent his whole life—loved him, honored him, and believed him worthy of every confidence and trust. And this was emphatically the case with him whose memory we commemorate to-day.

The Hon. WILLIAM H. CRAIN was a native of the great State of Texas. He grew up on its mighty plains, in its genial climate, and among the liberty-loving and generous people of that great State, beloved and honored by all its people.

It was they who recognized his worth and ability; it was they who elected him district attorney while yet a very young man. It was his neighbors and friends who sent him to represent them in the senate of his native State at the age of 28 years.

It was those who knew him and appreciated his great learning and ability who sent him to represent them in this Hall during the Forty-ninth Congress and returned him at every Congressional election thereafter up to this Congress.

No man served his constituency more loyally than he. No man in either House of Congress was more beloved than he who has gone to his last resting place.

That he had his faults no one will attempt to deny, but who has not faults? That he had many virtues all who know him bear testimony.

During our long journey through the sunny Southland, and especially when we reached his native State and Congressional district, the people turned out in vast multitudes, regardless of party or sect, to view the funeral train, and to pay their respects to the remains of their Representative and friend. Thousands of people all along the route through Texas at every station stood with uncovered heads to pay their last sad respects to our departed friend and brother.

When the funeral train arrived at Cuero, the beautiful little city where for so many years he had resided with his interesting family, every business house was closed, and the people turned out en masse to receive the mortal remains of their neighbor and friend.

It was indeed a sad home coming. It was a great and sad bereavement to his stricken family. But the high respect and love borne for him by those who knew him best was shown on every hand.

His funeral was largely attended, not only by the people of his Congressional district, but by prominent men throughout the State. The governor of Texas, together with his staff, came to pay their last respects.

The Catholic bishop of the diocese and other clergy came to assist at his funeral and to give words of consolation and cheer to his bereaved family, and thousands of men and women, representing all classes of people, stood around the open grave and dropped a silent tear to his memory.

Nothing we can say or do here to-day will add to or take from the record he made for himself and his country during that long period in which he was in its service. We can only pay our last tribute to his memory.

He has gone to that home beyond the great river, and where, in the course of nature, we, too, will soon follow him.

Let us remember all that was good and true in his nature, and forget those frailties and shortcomings which universally afflict mankind, and from which none of us escape.

Farewell, our brother, sleep peacefully beneath thy native sod. Sleep on until that great day when all who sleep shall arise and be judged by a righteous judgment, by Him who knoweth our innermost motives and actions, and who rewardeth according to our merits. Again farewell!

Mr. CROWLEY. Mr. Speaker, the custom prevailing in the House of Representatives when death stalks in its midst and carries away any of its members, to memorialize the life, character, and doings of the dead is a beautiful one, notwithstanding the manifest disposition of many distinguished members of this body who are endeavoring to abolish memorial services. I still say it is a beautiful custom, and long may it last!

The man whose memory we honor to-day by this custom, WILLIAM HENRY CRAIN, was born in the city of Galveston, Tex., November 25, 1848. He was the first native son of the Lone Star State who had the distinction of representing this great State in Congress, and until this Congress the only one. His father dying in Galveston, in 1854 he was sent to relatives residing in New York City, who placed him at the Christian Brothers' School until he was 14, when he entered St. Francis Xavier's College, and graduated from that famous institution of learning July 1, 1867, being valedictorian of his class.

After an absence of twelve years in the North, young CRAIN returned to Texas. For two years he lived on a ranch, worked as a cowboy, rode wild horses and drove cattle, and performed all the duties pertaining to a cowboy on a ranch; but growing tired of that life, he moved to Indianola, then a thriving city in Texas, and there taught school. While teaching he studied law with Messrs. Stockdale & Proctor, and was admitted to the bar and licensed to practice in 1871.

In July, 1873, he married Miss Angelina G. Mitchell, daughter of Capt. I. N. Mitchell, of Indianola. The result of this union living to-day are six children, four boys and two girls, namely: Frank, Viva, William Henry, James Kerr, Newton Mitchell, and Mary, varying in ages from 7 to 21 years.

In 1873 he was elected district attorney of the Twenty-third judicial district and served until 1876. In this position he, by his brilliancy and versatility, soon attracted attention, making for himself in this office a splendid record. When he entered on the discharge of the duties of his office the country was overrun with malefactors of every description. When he retired from office nearly all the malefactors had left that section of the country, and law had taken the place of lawlessness. Owing to the arduous duties attendant upon this position and being somewhat shattered in health, he refused a reelection to the office of district attorney, but accepted a nomination as State senator from the Democratic party to represent the Seventh district, to which position he was elected practically without opposition. In that body he was an active worker, taking high rank for a young man, and at that time even was looked on as one of the coming men of the State. Owing to change of residence he resigned after a single session.

He then removed to Hallettsville and practiced his profession with Col. S. C. Patten for four years. Here he was successful, and soon built up a large and lucrative practice. While an active member of the Democratic party, and always useful and untiring in his efforts for his ambitious friends, he was not an aspirant for any office, but was prevailed upon, on account of his oratorical ability, to serve as an elector for the State at large on the Hancock ticket in 1880.

Prior to 1882 he removed to Cuero, Dewitt County, which, under the apportionment of 1881, was placed in the Seventh Congressional district. Here he formed a law partnership with the Hon. Rudolph Kleberg, who was recently elected to fill his unexpired term in this Congress. While this partnership was never dissolved, it was merely nominal after his election to Congress in 1884. He represented the Seventh Congressional district continuously until 1892, when a redistricting of the State placed him in the Eleventh. This last district he represented since its formation. He never attended but one convention at which he was a candidate, notwithstanding that at times there was a good deal of opposition. He was elected to the Forty-ninth, Fiftieth, Fifty-first, Fifty-second, Fifty-third, and Fifty-fourth Congresses. At the expiration of this Congress it was his purpose, had he lived, to decline further service in public life, and so announced to his constituency several months prior to his death. His most bitter enemies have always accorded to him honesty of purpose and the courage of his convictions.

He possessed the love and confidence of his constituents to a remarkable degree, and was a political power in his section of his State. He was an able lawyer, a forceful and eloquent speaker, and charmed all with his close reasoning and magnetism. He was open and candid and never hesitated to express his opinion.

On the 4th of February, just six days before his death, he made a beautiful impromptu speech, his last on the floor of this House, which was characteristic of the man, as it was an appeal for the charitable institutions of the District of Columbia. It is a literary gem equal to anything I have ever read, which I quote from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

Mr. Chairman, going back thirty or thirty-five years, a war was waged for the dissolution of this Union. Soldiers innumerable on both sides of Mason and Dixon's line flocked to the standards of what they considered right. The reverberations of cannon echoed down the valleys of Virginia. Swords and muskets asserted their supremacy. Brother fought against brother; soldier on one side against soldier on the other. As the soldiers went down on the side of the Union, there came upon the battlefields the white-winged messengers of peace, robed in the garments of mercy and charity, and many a parched tongue and parched throat accepted the ministrations of those pure, beautiful creatures, who, protected by soldiers and officers, as well as by the President of the United States, the great, grand, and lamented Lincoln, came and ministered to them. Was there any question then on the part of the gentlemen from Nebraska as to granting those emissaries of mercy a commission to fulfill their errand to those soldiers? Did he then, or did those whom he now represents, rise in their might and protest against the charitable work of those angelic forms in human shape? No, Mr. Chairman, not one word of protest was uttered then. Yet the representatives of the descendants of the men who were assisted by those lovely women come here to-day and protest in the name of what? Infidelity against religion.

Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that this committee has put on record its vote in favor of the appropriation for the National Association for the Relief of Destitute Colored Women and Children (for which I voted), in view of the fact that that is an assertion on our part that the institution is not private in its character and is nonsectarian, although according to the statement of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations it is in no wise different from the one now before us for consideration, I fail to see how our Republican brethren can vote against the appropriation.

His interest in the future development of southwestern Texas is shown by the following excerpt from a speech delivered at Corpus Christi on Tuesday, March 24, 1891:

The people of the North and West want to find a more congenial climate than they now enjoy in their present homes. They are well aware that no such climate and soil can be found anywhere in the world as are found within the confines of the State of Texas. Deep water in itself would not build up and develop this country. We had a Northern invasion many years ago, and our fathers, sons, and brothers bared their breasts to repel the invaders. But that era has happily passed, and times have changed. We want another Northern invasion, and we will receive the invaders with open arms and shouts of joy. We want them to come with their wives, families, and kindred. We want them to come and stay with us—be one of us—and help develop the resources of the country.

The population of Texas has nearly doubled in the last decade, and it can go on and double for the next decade, and the next, and the next, and still there will be room for more industrious settlers in this grand empire. All these settlers will contribute to the wealth and upbuilding of the country, and will furnish export cargoes for the ships of the world that will enter your deep-water ports a few years hence. Without these settlers Texas would not derive any great benefit to the State at large from deep water. It is the back country after all that makes great cities, and it is the grand back country of the whole Union that has created and maintained the large commercial cities along the Atlantic Seaboard. Without the back country these cities could not have been created or maintained. We want the hardy young blood of the North and Northwest planted in the virgin soil of Texas, and we want lots of it. Give us half a million industrious farmers, mechanics, and artisans in the next few years and southwest Texas will leap forward with a bound that will astonish the world. They are surely coming, and you should welcome them and bid them join hands with you and lend nature a helping hand. Cut up your pastures into small tracts, sell them to the man with the hoe, and prosperity will follow in his tracks. He will have to exchange the products of the soil for merchandise brought hither by rail and water. He will raise a family, and every member will be both a partner and a consumer, and the wealth of the country will be increased proportionately.

Mr. CRAIN was a ripe scholar, and was shortly before his death paid a compliment by that eminent educationist and great scholar, Dr. William Everett, of Massachusetts, in reply to a communication from a gentleman in this city, who wrote to know if Dr. Everett had been correctly quoted in expressing his appreciation of the former's ability to handle his mother tongue. This was the reply:

QUINCY, MASS., December 26, 1895.

MY DEAR SIR: You were not misinformed. My seat was very near Mr. CRAIN's, and I had constant opportunities to hear him, both in conversation and debate. His English was simply faultless, copious, correct, natural, without a trace of vulgarity, provincialism, or pedantry, the language of a cultivated gentleman, who respected his mother tongue as well as mastering it. I avoid comparisons, but it was a delight to me to hear anyone talk whose language would satisfy every community and every person whereof English is the native speech.

Yours, very truly,
EDWARD SMITH, Esq.

WILLIAM EVERETT.

The admiration which Mr. CRAIN had won in early life as an entertaining and amiable companion in private society increased with his years. Those who knew him not within the circle of friendship knew him only by halves. He was always what he appeared, the scholar and the gentleman, the entertaining and instructive companion; polite, yet friendly; social, yet respectful. In his friendships he was strong, firm, and unalterable. He had great benevolence, enlarged ideas of philanthropy, and no tongue or pen can do him more justice than his own kind deeds for men, women, and children, and those deeds are usually outdone by the doing.

He was at his post of duty when suddenly taken ill on Thursday afternoon, February 6, suffering severely from a cold contracted at the Southern Relief Society ball on the night of February 4, and died of pneumonia on the Monday following, in the meridian of a most useful life. His death was a shock to the House, to his constituency, and to me a personal bereavement.

Mr. CRAIN was not unmindful of his end, yet seemed not to dread it, but patiently and placidly waited the hour appointed to all living, and as the dawn was breaking he peacefully passed to eternal rest. Thus died the Hon. WILLIAM HENRY CRAIN, on Monday, February 10, 1896. On the same night the committee of the two Houses of Congress with the remains of the great Texas statesman started on the long sad journey to his far-distant home.

From Houston his venerable and sorrow-stricken mother, with delegations of his friends and constituents from the surrounding country, accompanied the body to his home and family. As the draped car passed through the towns of the district he loved so well, sorrow was plainly seen upon the faces of the people, for the voice of their eloquent and chivalrous Representative was now hushed forever.

He was buried in the cemetery at Cuero, his home. The sun shone bright and clear on that day, but it brought no delight to the eyes, no cheer to the hearts of his friends. Flags hung from every pole at half-mast, business was suspended, and the schools were closed to enable the children of his home to look for the last time upon his intellectual face and to witness the commitment to mother earth of the body of Texas's noble son. Tributes were offered and resolutions were adopted throughout the State expressive of the sorrow of the people. Courts were adjourned and respect was paid to his memory by bench, bar, and press.

Judge Robert B. Green, a distinguished jurist of San Antonio, Tex., said:

I unhesitatingly say that I believe he is the most brilliant man Texas ever sent to Washington. I know of no man upon whom nature bestowed more of her gifts, and in an intimate acquaintance with him I never knew him to exercise any of his great gifts except for the good of his fellow-men. He was very strong as an advocate, and particularly strong in legislative and parliamentary bodies. His personal magnetism, coupled with great abilities, made him a most useful member of Congress, and he was of especial value to our section of the State. He accomplished and was instrumental in accomplishing many works that tend to the material progress of our State, and upon many of the future gigantic developments of our particular section the corner stones thereof should have inscribed the name of WILLIAM HENRY CRAIN.

I can not properly pen the estimate that should be placed upon him as a companion, citizen, public servant, and man. It would require one of his rare qualities and gifted powers to write a suitable eulogy to his memory. Suffice it to say that he used his magnificent endowment by nature for the good and honor of his State and district, and that he was eminently a useful man.

Judge Thomas M. Paschal, of Texas, a colleague of his in the last Congress, wrote thus:

To say that this gifted and useful son of Texas was without faults, faults that marred the harmonious whole and symmetry of his character, would be to say what he least of all would have had insincerely said of him, but it can be truthfully said that the one human being who could most seriously complain of them was WILLIAM HENRY CRAIN himself. Over none in Texas or Congress who have crossed the great river and now rest beneath the shade of the trees will the mantle of charity be more completely drawn than over him. At the foot of none will be laid more lasting or genuine tribute. And his friends will ever shed a tear as his name is spoken, or his words and deeds remembered.

The press of the State which had honored him, and which he had honored, laid tributes of grief and sorrow on his bier. I quote the following from the Laredo News:

To pay tribute to this man is the duty of every man who called him friend. To those from whom he differed, both in politics and religion, he accorded the greatest freedom, and expected nothing less than he gave, and even Pythias had nothing to teach him in friendship. Could it be possible that such a man could go to that that mind could not conceive without a requiem in means? "Let the dead past bury its dead," and no man who admires all that goes to make up a noble manhood will deny the tribute. "This was a man." With all his faults, where shall we find his equal?

The El Paso Times said:

His bitterest enemies have always accorded to him honesty of purpose and the courage of his convictions. BILL CRAIN will live in the pale moonlight of memory, and his name will shine resplendent in the list of patriots who have crossed over the river to rest in the shade of the trees.

To his political promises he was constant as the polarstar. By his friends, through calm and storm, he stood like the granite hills. He knew the people; the people knew him. Many times he was their standard bearer. He was never defeated and never surrendered until he bowed his head in death.

And now he sleeps in the breast of the mother State he loved and served so well. Farewell, friend CRAIN. Thy life's battle is over. May thy soul find sweet rest in the sleep of the dead, and when the morning light breaks on resurrection day may your soul ascend to that abode above where all is peace and all is love.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, it was not my privilege to enjoy a very intimate acquaintance with WILLIAM HENRY CRAIN, but the short acquaintance I had with him endeared him to me very strongly. I think I do not go beyond the bounds of reason and fairness when I say that he was truly one of God's noblemen. The gentlemen who have preceded me and who have uttered words of earnest eulogy were, most of them, much more intimately acquainted with him than I was. They have told you, in beautiful and expressive language, of his career at college, how his kindly nature and his broad and generous sympathies endeared him to every member of his class, and how at that early age he gave promise of future greatness. They have followed his course in the days of his early manhood in his native State. They have told you of his service as district attorney, an office which demands the exercise of the best judgment, and sometimes of the stern spirit of justice, and they have described how, in that capacity, he was first of all true to the Commonwealth, true to the people, and how, regardless of friend or foe, he always meted out exact justice. They have described his career as a leader in the senate of Texas, and told you how he then manifested the same abilities and qualities which afterwards made him eminent in this House.

He became a member of this body in the year 1884. By his ability, by his knowledge of public affairs, by his wisdom, his forethought, and his judgment he soon became a prominent factor in the House of Representatives. I remember when, by reason of ill health, I was absent from the deliberations of this body on the occasion of the first debate of the District appropriation bill, I read the sentiments spoken by Mr. CRAIN on this floor—words which have been quoted by the gentleman who has preceded me—and I remember how proud and happy I felt that there was in this Chamber a man holding the same religious views which I held, belonging to the same church to which I belonged, who was ready to stand up here to defend her principles and defend her sons and daughters when unjustly attacked. But that was to be expected from WILLIAM HENRY CRAIN. He was always loyal and devoted to his church, always loyal and devoted to her teachings. In all the debates in which he participated in this body he showed himself to be one of the keenest observers, one of the best informed members, one who had always the interests of the whole people in view, one who could at all times be depended upon to cast his vote in the interest of justice and of broad humanity.

The gentleman who has preceded me [Mr. CROWLEY] read to the House a few moments ago the graceful tribute paid by Dr. Everett to the beauty of the diction and the rhetoric of Mr. CRAIN. Nothing that I could say would add to that, and I will not attempt to make any addition to it other than to say that such a tribute from such a source, coming from a man in my own State whose abilities in that line are recognized to be among the most eminent in our Commonwealth, is highly honorable and must be very gratifying to those who hold the memory of Mr. CRAIN in admiring and affectionate remembrance.

Mr. Speaker, WILLIAM HENRY CRAIN is no more. He died in this beautiful city of Washington during the cold, bleak days of winter. His body lies entombed beneath the green fields of Texas. The flowers of spring now grow and blush above his grave, and we, the members of this House, gather here to-day to pay tribute to his noble qualities. In closing, let me say, Mr. Speaker, that it seems to me that Boyle O'Reilly typified such a man as Mr. CRAIN most eloquently when he wrote the beautiful lines which end:

Come, brothers; here was a teacher,
And the lessons he taught were good;
There are no classes nor races,
But one human brotherhood.

There are no creeds to be outlawed,
No color of skin debarred;
Mankind is one in his rights and wrongs—
One right, one hope, one guard.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Mr. Speaker, I was not apprised until a few moments before I entered the Hall that there were to be eulogies this afternoon upon our departed colleague, WILLIAM HENRY CRAIN, and therefore I have not prepared myself to say anything formally, but still I can not forego this opportunity of paying my tribute of respect to the memory of a man who, during more than ten years in this Congress, commanded my admiration and affection. My early acquaintance with Mr. CRAIN, upon his entering Congress, sprang from a very peculiar coincidence. Before he was born, and when I had been born but a little while, my father, William Milliken, of Montville, Me., went to Texas. He built a number of houses at Port Lavaca. During his first year there the Comanche Indians, who were then very strong and very hostile to the whites, raided the town, scalped the men, violated the women, and set the town on fire. Those who could do so took to boats and vessels to secure their safety.

On the same boat with my father was a very beautiful and accomplished girl. Eight years afterwards, having been married, there was born to her a boy; and in the Forty-ninth Congress, that boy, having grown to manhood, I met as a colleague in the Hall of the House of Representatives. It was WILLIAM H. CRAIN, our departed colleague and friend. His mother, a very charming lady, was in Washington several years ago, and recollected the Indian raid upon Port Lavaca and all its terrible details, which, of course, were most interesting history to me. The coincidence to which I have referred attracted me to Mr. CRAIN, gave me a personal interest in him, a feeling of warm friendship for him, and I became more intimate with him on that account than I should otherwise have been. It was an intimacy that was always most gratifying to myself, for I found him to be one of the most lovable characters that I had ever had the good fortune to know.

WILLIAM H. CRAIN was a brave, honest, earnest man. His handsome face, his fine physique, his manly bearing, his uniform courtesy and kindness, and his generous nature could not fail to make him attractive to every one who had a heart and a mind to admire that which is good and beautiful.

Even if I were ever so well prepared, I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that I could not say anything that would be satisfactory to myself on this occasion. There are times in human life when the feelings which well up in the heart can not find adequate expression in words. When the devout Christian stands by the altar and partakes of the bread and wine which to him, if to no one else, is the blood and body of the Saviour whom he worships, and in whose pure life and painful, tragic death he thinks he sees his only hope of a happy life beyond the grave, he does it in subdued tones or in silence. When the Mohammedan, at the setting of the sun, kneels down and makes his orisons, he does it in utterance inaudible; and when a man stands by the deathbed of a friend, or thinks of him as we do to-day of having gone over the dark and shadowy river, tears alone are his natural language. So, while I would gladly pay to our deceased and lamented colleague a tribute such as I feel and such as he deserves, it is not possible for me to do so.

He has gone to return to us no more upon the shores of time. We shall see his incomings and outgoings no longer. His eloquent voice has been hushed. The charm of his material presence we shall feel here not again. But I feel that the influence of his noble qualities of mind and heart will ever linger with us as lingers the perfume of a sweet flower even when we have long parted from it.

We will cherish his memory as a possession most dear to us. Let us hope and believe that his eyes have opened to the morning light of a never-ending day. Let us have faith that he dwells beneath the smile of that Divine Power who created life, not to be swallowed up in death, but to be renewed, purified, and enlarged in a realm of clearer light and broader vision, where the noblest aspirations and grandest dreams of our lives here shall become our assured and beautiful realities.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Speaker, I had not such an acquaintance with the gentleman whose memory we mourn to-day as would warrant me in any detailed remarks in the way of a funeral oration or eulogium upon his character. What I have heard others say concerning him certainly has been calculated to bring a sentiment of complacency to our minds in connection with him: In the first place, that he was a gallant man, and in the next, that he had faith; and if these were possessed by him he fulfilled and carried out the requirements of two of the great cardinal virtues taught in the Divine Word. We have been instructed to add to our faith, as the best of virtues which man can possess, manliness and courage; and certainly there can be nothing more appropriate for a man who represents and loves the people than to exhibit the spirit, the sentiment, and the practice of bravery and manliness.

Mr. Speaker, I am always delighted whenever I see among public men that generous tone of bearing toward their associates, that unselfish attitude of action and opinion, which indicates to my mind the possession of true manliness.

As I said on a former occasion, greatness in human life is not to be measured alone by intellectual powers. It is a faculty that concerns the heart as well as the brain. A man must have a great soul to be a great man. He may have very many infirmities and many peccadillos, but if the soul is broad, full of humanity and unselfishness and of charity, he has in his heart some of the elements that make a great man. And then, if he has a broad intellect, with discriminating, comprehensive faculties of the mind and acumen to perceive circumstances, conditions, or situations and make them available to the interests of human nature, I think he needs no qualifications that go to make up a great man. And in so far as this was a manly man, a man of that character, he had at least the elements of greatness in his composition. So far as I had an opportunity in being acquainted with him I found him brave and intellectual.

I have been pleased, Mr. Speaker, on these funeral occasions, the with disposition of kindness which has been manifested on the part of the members of this body to speak well of those who have left us. In voting and speaking upon a resolution in regard to a proposition to do away with the memorial services, such as those which Congress has been in the habit of practicing in the past, I took the ground and made remarks touching the point that if nothing else were to be gained than an opportunity to speak well of those who have left us it seems to me that the exercises would be well worth the trouble and the time.

I said that public men, and particularly men in deliberative bodies, were too likely to find out what was objectionable in, and to enlarge upon the shortcomings of, their conferees and fellows, but that these funeral occasions afforded especially favorable opportunities for magnifying what they had found, if they never had before acknowledged it, good and broad and great in their departed fellows. I was impressed with this idea during the services that were held the other day. These manly intellects, broad hearts, affectionate natures which we find in representative men, such as those that have passed away from these scenes and are sleeping the last long sleep of death—I say these broad intellects, ever seeking to know more and more of the mysterious and the mighty, and these enlarged affectional impulses of the human soul, to me are presumptive arguments in favor of another life.

I do not and can not believe that so much of good material, intellectual, affectional, spiritual, social, was ever intended to be interwrought into a human structure for the existence and the limitations of only three score years and ten. When an architect builds a magnificent temple he lays the foundation deep in the soil, constructs it of impregnable and lasting marble, spreads the architrave and extends the walls, so that it shall not be a thing of a season; but, with all its grandeur and costliness and splendor, the idea underlies the whole operation that it is to last for generations, and he would, if he could, like the ancient Egyptians, aim at immortality with material things. I can not believe that Almighty God, the skillful and eternal Creator who has constructed the strange architecture of the little pebble and the fine fiber and fabric of the wing of the tiny insect, which can keep its place in the pathway of the eagle through the storm—that that Divine hand, with all its skill, ever incorporated so much valuable material in a human life to let it cease utterly at the end of three score years and ten.

I wanted to say this here in this House, and that was the purpose I had in rising. I believe that death is not the end of all things; that it is not the destruction of the living power; that the fact that we live now is a presumption that we shall live hereafter, unless it can be shown that death is the destruction of the living power, and I think every presumption is against it. And though we may not be willing to go into the fine-spun philosophy of theology, I think this presumption lays itself at the door of the common sense of every man. There is too much in us to pass away with a season. These men who have left us will live again somewhere, in the undiscovered country to which we are hastening; and it is a good thing for us to remember that we are mortal and that we are immortal, and that our immortality carries with it a responsibility which is as becoming and as fitting and as effective in a legislator as in any other man in the community.

I have long since thought, before it was ever my honored privilege to appear in this august presence, that it ought to be considered a great functional privilege of a legislature such as this, a National Legislature, to hold up and have a very high standard of manhood. I think we ought to be above any small or meanly selfish thing; that we ought, indeed, to learn to ascend the elevation of human excellence which has been so beautifully marked out in those striking words in Scripture, adding to faith virtue, and to virtue knowledge, and to knowledge temperance, and to temperance patience, and to patience godliness, and to godliness brotherly kindness, and to brotherly kindness charity; that every man should make an earnest and honest daily attempt to ascend this sublime elevation, and when he gets at the summit he ought to find himself with his feet on the neck of his passions. In that lofty height to which he has attained he ought to feel that he is really himself a conqueror of the world through faith and virtue. And it is my honest desire that the American Congress shall have just as much of this grand principle as is possible under the circumstances and environments of public life.

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. Speaker, I offer the resolutions which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of our esteemed colleague and friend, W. H. CRAIN, late a Representative from the State of Texas.

Resolved, That the sympathies of the members of this House be extended to the family of Mr. CRAIN in their bereavement, and that the Clerk of the House transmit to them a copy of these resolutions.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the deceased the House do now adjourn.

The resolutions were agreed to.

Accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the House, in accordance with the special order, adjourned until 8 o'clock p. m.

SPECIAL EVENING SESSION.

The House was called to order at 8 o'clock p. m. by Mr. BROWNING, Chief Clerk, who read the following communication:

SPEAKER'S ROOM, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., April 25, 1896.

Mr. PAYNE of New York is appointed to act as Speaker pro tempore for the evening session.

T. B. REED, Speaker.

The CHIEF CLERK. The gentleman from New York will please take the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House will be in order.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill H. R. 8271 be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from South Dakota asks unanimous consent that the bill H. R. 8271 be considered to-night in the House as in Committee of the Whole, for general debate. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, we are in the House considering this bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee will be recognized for ten minutes.

Mr. COX. I do not want half that time. It is so evident to everybody that we are proceeding here to-night without anybody present in the consideration of this bill, that will probably involve from $3,000,000 to $5,000,000 of appropriation, that I think it proper for the House to adjourn, and I make that motion. There are not six members on the floor of the House.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. COX. Just for the sake of seeing how many there are here, I call for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 1, noes 6.

So the motion to adjourn was rejected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana is recognized.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, for two days the bill now being considered has been under discussion, and during that time we have been led to understand from our friends, the enemy, who occupy seats on the Democratic side of this House that the only true friend of the true Union soldier during all these years since the war has been the Democratic party and Democratic members of Congress. Now, Mr. Speaker, let us reason together for a few moments on this proposition. I find by a careful examination of the vote on every general pension bill from the Forty-sixth Congress to the present time that the vote of the majority of Democrats in Congress has been recorded against pension legislation. "The God's truth of the whole matter is" that the Democratic party as represented upon this floor, with a few exceptions, notably my distinguished friend from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS] and a few gallant gentlemen who fought with the South, have by their voices, their objections, and votes shown themselves absolutely opposed to any increase of the pension roll for Union soldiers, their widows, and their orphans. Yet, Mr. Speaker, the Northern Democracy as represented upon this floor would have the false representation go to the country that they are the special friends of the Union soldier. Why, sir, upon a careful examination of every vote that has been had upon the passage of pension bills since 1879 we find that all of the opposition has come from the Democratic party with the exception of one single Republican vote. The following has been the party vote on all important bills since 1879 as I find the vote recorded in the records of Congress:

Arrears act of January 25, 1879: In the Senate—Republicans voted for the bill, 28; against the bill, none. Democrats for the bill, 16; against the bill, 4. In the House—Republicans for the bill, 116; against the bill, none. Democrats for the bill, 48; against the bill, 63.

Arrears act of March 3, 1879: In the Senate—for the bill, 44; against the bill, 3 (all Democrats). In the House—for the bill, 183; against the bill, 67 (66 Democrats, 1 Republican).

Right to increase or reduce pensions, act of June 21, 1879: In the Senate—no yeas-and-nays vote. In the House—for the bill, 187; against the bill, 23 (all Democrats).

Widows' increase act of March 10, 1880: In the Senate—no yeas-and-nays vote. In the House—Republicans for the bill, 113; against the bill, none. Democrats for the bill, 80; against the bill, 66.

Dependent pension bill: In the Senate—no yeas-and-nays vote. In the House—Republicans for the bill, 114; against the bill, none. Democrats for the bill, 66; against the bill, 76.

On motion to pass over veto: In the House—Republicans for the bill, 138; against the bill, none. Democrats for the bill, 37; against the bill, 125.

Amputation act of August 4, 1880: In the House—Republicans for the bill, 91; against the bill, none. Democrats for the bill, 75; against the bill, 51. In the Senate—no yeas-and-nays vote.

Dependent pension bill, act of June 27, 1890, first vote: In the House—Democrats for the bill, 38; against the bill, 71. Republicans for the bill, 141; against the bill, none. In the Senate—Democrats for the bill, 10; against the bill, 13. Republicans for the bill, 32; against, none.

Dependent pension bill, conference vote: In the House—Democrats for the bill, 28; against the bill, 56. Republicans for the bill, 117; against the bill, none. In the Senate—Democrats for the bill, 3; against the bill, 18. Republicans for the bill, 31; against the bill, none.

Arrears act: Democrats for the bill, 48; Democrats against the bill, 61; Republicans for the bill 116. Republicans against the bill, none.

As this bill passed under suspension of the rules, it required two-thirds, or 150 yeas, of which 150 the Republicans furnished 116 and the Democrats the remainder.

This bill was taken up in the Senate on January 16, 1879, and after brief debate it was passed by a vote of 43 to 3.

The yeas were 27 Republicans and 16 Democrats, and the 3 nays were all Democrats.

The arrears act was not introduced by a Democrat, was not moved by a Democrat, was not passed by Democratic votes. A majority of Democrats in the House voted against it. Every vote cast against it in either House was by a Democrat.

On the votes on pension bills which I have cited I find that only one Republican vote is recorded as cast against any of the bills, and that the total Republican vote cast in the House of Representatives for the bills I have named was 1,421, and that 637 Democratic votes are recorded against these just and meritorious pension measures. The votes mentioned show, Mr. Speaker, that all opposition to pension legislation has come from the Democratic party.

Mr. Speaker, the Democrats of the North, as represented on the floor of this House to-day, are but the lickspittles of their Southern brethren, ready and willing to lick the hands of those Democrats of the South who, by unconstitutional abridgment of the suffrage, occupy seats in Congress, and who silently but effectively dictate to and shape the policy of the Northern Democratic Congressmen, who are too cowardly to claim their souls their own.

Now, Mr. Speaker, after carefully considering the bill that is now before the House, I have concluded that so far as I am individually concerned I am willing and ready to vote for every section of it. While it may be said that men may be placed upon the pension rolls by the passage of this bill who served in the Confederate army, yet at the same time I learn from history, through reading the facts as they exist, that thousands of men of Union sympathies were pressed into the Confederate service, and as soon as they had an opportunity they left the Confederate service and went under the flag that their fathers fought for in the war with Mexico and their grandfathers in the war of the Revolution. My friend the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions has said that the Confederate soldier has been forgiven for every act he ever committed except that of entering the Army of the Union, and I believe the time has come when he should be forgiven that act.

I did not have an opportunity, or perhaps I might have had an opportunity and did not embrace it, of being a soldier in the Union Army; but in order to anticipate any remark that may be made by gentlemen on the other side of this House on account of the fact that I am of Canadian birth I want to say proudly that 40,000 Canadians left their homes and enlisted in the Union Army, while 10,000 gentlemen from the South and copperheads from the North went into Canada during the war of the rebellion and plotted treason against this Government, and sought by words and by deeds to spread disease and contagion among the people of the North and burn Northern cities. Although I was not one of those who bared their breasts to the heat of battle in our great national struggle for liberty and union, yet it is not necessary that I should be criticised by Northern copperheads on account of that fact, because I have endeavored by my vote in this House to show my friendship for the Union soldier. I do not yet believe that the time has come when the people of the North should turn their backs upon those who saved the nation and made this a land of liberty.

I find that our Southern brethren have not yet forgotten the unholy and treasonable cause for which they fought, in proof of which I find that in the city of Charleston, S. C., on the 23d of the present month the Confederates assembled in reunion and boasted of their treason, and in this connection, Mr. Speaker, I desire to include in my remarks a portion of the account of the Confederate reunion at Charleston as I find it recorded in the Charleston (S. C.) News and Courier of April 23, 1896, as follows:

LAST NIGHT'S GRAND RALLY.

It was a notable gathering, that which took place at German Artillery Hall last night. Under waving banners, representing the four years of the great struggle for State's rights, under the blaze of hundreds of lights, and in the presence of hundreds of Charleston's fairest ladies and bravest men, hundreds of South Carolina veterans were royally welcomed to the old City by the Sea.

The German Artillery Hall is a handsome place at all times, but never before has it presented such a scene as last evening. The entrance is through an arch formed by two immense palmetto trees, flanked by brass cannon and 15-inch shells. The entire truss work of the roof is hung with flags. The signal flags of half a dozen ships make a pleasing variety, but the prevailing theme is the "stars and bars" and the Southern cross. The south stage is draped with the flags of the Confederacy of 1861, and at various other points are the Confederate flags of 1862, 1863, and 1864, with the battle flags everywhere. The front of the south stage is trimmed in palmetto branches, moss, and laurel leaves. On the right, all wreathed in laurel, hangs a portrait of Gen. Robert E. Lee, on the left is Jackson, and in the center Jefferson Davis. Two large palmetto trees stand in the corner at the south end of the hall. The north stage is a beautiful piece of decoration. Edged with palmetto, laurel, gray moss and laurel, the rail is surmounted by potted palms, Spanish bayonets, azaleas, and callas. Above this stage hang flags of various nations.

OPENED WITH PRAYER.

When quiet was restored and the audience was in order Commander Brodie, of Camp Sumter, asked the members to unite in prayer. The Rev. Mr. Thompson was called upon to deliver the prayer, and he touched the hearts of the veterans. He said:

"Lord God Almighty, Jehovah of Hosts, in Thy kind providence we are met to-night as the representatives of vanished armies, of desperately fought battlefields, of the dear, dead Confederacy. Let Thy benediction rest upon our exchange of salutations upon our revival of martial comradeship.

"May we hold in eternal honor the glorious chieftains who led us and the soldiers who surrendered their lives to their conviction of duty.

"May the motives that governed us and the righteous principles for which the South went forth to battle be transmitted to the future by impartial and unprejudiced historians.

"May these survivors whose ranks are thinning and who must all soon be gone enlist under a greater than an earthly leader, and in a cause far grander than that which has passed away, and be gathered at last as the good soldiers of Jesus Christ—victors over the world and the flesh and the devil, into the everlasting Kingdom of our God.

"Hear us in the name of our Redeemer. Amen."

THE MAYOR'S WELCOME.

Mayor Smyth as he arose was received with applause. He proceeded at once to extend a most cordial welcome to the visitors, saying:

"COMRADES: There needs no words of mine to emphasize the welcome Charleston offers to Confederate veterans. In spite of the years that have rolled by and the vicissitudes through which she has passed; in spite of the calamities and persecutions she has suffered and still suffers, the heart of this good old city beats as true to-night to the great principles for which you fought as in 1860, when the first ordinance of secession was passed within her walls, or in 1861, when the boom of the first cannon of the war reverberated across the blue waves of her beautiful harbor, to be echoed and reechoed a thousand times over and over again during the four bloody years that followed.

"Were it conceivable that the authorities of Charleston could hesitate or be lukewarm in their welcome the very city gates would fly open wide of their own accord at the approaching tramp of the men who wore the gray, and did her people fail to meet you with warm and loving hospitality the very stones in her streets would utter shouts of greeting and of welcome. Thank God, however, Charleston's loyalty can not be questioned. It has stood every test and has never wavered. There is no spot in all this broad and sunny Southland where the memories of the heroes who fought and bled and died for the Southern Confederacy are more tenderly cherished, or where the 'lost cause' and all it represents is held in deeper reverence than in this old City by the Sea—the city that Beauregard so gallantly defended and to whose sacred keeping with his dying breath he bequeathed that sword that had so often flashed forth defiance to her enemies and to his.

"Even amid those sad, dark days 'when the cruel war was o'er,' and the remnant of the many brave sons she had sent forth to battle had returned home, broken in heart, health, and in fortune, even then Charlestonians were not ashamed to be known as 'Confederates.' Soon after reaching home her sons gathered themselves together and formed a Confederate Survivors' Association, the first one in the South, an association which only a few days ago celebrated its thirtieth anniversary, with over 100 members present. This has now been merged into Camp Sumter, and to-day there are in Charleston two large camps of Confederate veterans, a flourishing chapter of the Daughters of the Confederacy, and an enthusiastic camp of the Sons of Veterans, who are here to-night to extend to you the right hand of comradeship and of welcome.

"Had you still any doubt of Charleston's devotion to the Confederate cause, and of her love for the Confederate veteran, could you have stood in her streets a few months ago, on Hampton's Day [applause], and witnessed the grand outpouring of the people to greet that gallant soldier, that noble hero, and listened to the shouts of welcome that rolled and swelled continuously as he rode by; had you seen the vast throng assembled to listen to his words of counsel and of wisdom rise to their feet, like one man, at his entrance, women joining the men in pouring forth enthusiastic cheers upon cheers; had you seen and heard that day, you would have been convinced beyond a question that there was 'life in the old land yet,' and that the great heart of Charleston thrilled and throbbed with the same old love and patriotic devotion of days gone by."

"The signal flags of a half dozen ships made a pleasing variety; but the prevailing theme is the 'stars and bars' and the Southern cross!" The "stage was draped with the flags of the Confederacy of 1861, and at various points are the Confederate flags of 1862, 1863, and 1864, with the battle flags everywhere," while the preacher prayed, "May the motives that governed us and the righteous principles for which the South went forth to battle be transmitted to the future by impartial and unprejudiced historians," and the mayor of Charleston said, "The heart of the good old city beats as true to-night to the great principles for which you fought as in 1860, when the first ordinance of secession was passed within her walls; and had you stood in the streets a few months ago, on Hampton's day, you would have been convinced beyond a question that there was 'life in the old land yet,' and that the great heart of Charleston thrilled and throbbed with the same old love and patriotic devotion of days gone by."

This, Mr. Speaker, explains the sentiment of South Carolina to-day. The words of the South Carolina editor, preacher, and mayor of Charleston speak for themselves; and, sir, as a sequel to the account of the recent Confederate reunion I will include in my remarks the following editorial on the reunion from the Charleston (S. C.) News and Courier of the same date, which paper I hold in my hand, and find on the editorial page an article which declares that the attempt to establish the Southern Confederacy was a "dream that was worth the dreaming. It has left us," says this South Carolina editor, "nothing to regret but its end." Is it possible that any man in this country regrets the end of that terrible strife? Is it possible that any editor in all this land of ours can regret that that strife has been ended?

Mr. PICKLER. What did the gentleman say was the date of that paper?

Mr. HARDY. Thursday morning, April 23, 1896.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HARDY. I would like fifteen minutes more, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MILES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be allowed fifteen minutes additional.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. HARDY. This editorial, Mr. Speaker, is as follows:

THE REUNION AND A RETROSPECT.

What hosts of strange and stirring memories are recalled to the older generation in Charleston to-day as we look on the groups of veterans on the streets, or greet old acquaintances among them as we meet them passing about with bent forms or empty sleeves or on crutches, or still carrying themselves with the bearing of soldiers, but all showing war-worn and time-worn faces, and heads touched with the frost of age, and appearing, as they go about marked with their varied badges of service under the rows of Confederate flags fluttering overhead, almost as ghosts come back to remind us of the hopes and fears, the days of alternating glory and of gloom they shared with us years and years ago "in the land when we were dreaming."

What a dream it was! Who would have missed sharing in it, with its soul-stirring visions and aspirations, even though it vanished into nothingness at the last, leaving us stunned and heart-sore and all but discouraged at the sad and stern awakening. It is something to us that we dreamed it for four glorious years! That our hopes were so high and our hearts were so hot while it lasted. That our pulses were set to the throbbing of drums and our veins tingled with the fierce joy of battle in a cause to which all were alike devoted. That we feared no fate in life or death, and fought as men should fight who fight for all that men hold dear, in scorn of consequence to one or all. That we had faith in ourselves and faith in each other, and bore the brunt of unequal war without caring for the odds or counting the odds against us, content in the assurance that each would do his part and do it well and to the bitter end!

It was a dream that was worth the dreaming. It has left us nothing to regret but its end. We were free while we dreamed, and struggled to make the dream a glorious reality. The land we fought for was ours. The dear flag that floated over it was ours. It floated in the sunshine and under the stars over a united people, of one race, one blood, and having one purpose—the purpose to establish it among the flags of the nations and make it forever worthy of its glorious unfolding. A dream only though it was, it was a dream worth the dreaming, and whose every incident is worth recalling as often as its heroes come together around peaceful camp fires of their ever-thinning "reunions," or as often as they gather their children and children's children about their knees to hear the brave old story told again and again around the fires in their homes.

The memories of one day, one hour, of the glorious past are worth more to us than a decade of such dull years as these. They are memories to be cherished and loved and guarded and handed down from heroic father to son, and from equally heroic mother to daughter, as their chiefest treasures for all time to come. What is there to compare with them in the gross and groveling present? Who of the new generation can taste the cup of passionate delights, of profound emotions, of exalted sentiments, of burning enthusiasms, of pride in victories hardly but grandly won, which was our portion in full measure, and which we drained even to the bitter dregs, with these "old soldiers" only a few years ago?

It is all over now. The dream has faded and gone. The dear flag is folded and is forgotten save by the faithful few. The flag it opposed floats over it, and we walk in its shadow as we go about the businesses that engage us in the latter and duller days. We are at one with those who fought us down and crushed our hope. Their monuments tower over the fields where we fought so vainly, if so well, while our dead sleep by thousands in unmarked graves. We are a conquered people and the marks of our conquest are on every hand. Some of us have already attained the last low level of subjugation, and bowing in humility to the feet of the victors, deny the faith their fathers fought for and profess satisfaction over their defeat. Happily for our pride and hope for the future, they are few. But we are a changed people since the war drums were silenced and the battle flags were folded a little more than three decades ago, and the change has been for the worse, as none can fail to see and understand.

The old days of our four years of true "liberty and independence," when we were our own masters and played the part of brave men on the world's stage, come back in memory with the coming among us of so many of the brave men who gave to us that blessed brief experience. Hats off to them! A heart's welcome to them! All honor to them, every one! We owe to them all that we have of honor and fame in history. The story of the glory of the Southern Confederacy is the story of their deeds, and the record is closed forever. A few more years and they will have passed from our sight never to return. There are none to take their places. We shall miss them when they are gone.

All honor and service and blessing should be their portion while they are yet with us. It is "Confederate week" in Charleston, and the old heroes, all crowned with the "gray" we love so well, are our guests while it lasts. Let us not forget for a moment to honor and entertain them, every one, in such spirit and form as is due to the immortals.

That is an editorial in the leading paper of Charleston, the chief city of the great State of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, that editorial does not preach good doctrine to the American people. That editorial teaches the children of the soldier of the South that the Southern cause was right in the great conflict of years gone by. That editorial is wrong. The Southern people should teach their children that they at the time thought they were right in the great struggle which they maintained against the flag and the country, but are now convinced of their error. They should teach the children that there is only one flag and room for only one flag in this nation, and that not the "Stars and Bars," but the "Stars and Stripes," the heaven-born banner of Washington, of Lincoln, of Grant, and the Union. [Applause.] So much, Mr. Speaker, for the present prevailing sentiment in South Carolina. The country can consider the matter and govern itself accordingly. The prayer of the preacher, the speech of the mayor, and the editorial of the editor will stand denounced and condemned by every loyal heart in all this broad land of ours as the rankest vapors of the unreconstructed, disloyal element of the South Carolina Democracy, and can only find a responsive echo in the breasts of the cowardly, truckling Democrats of the North, who always stand ready to kiss the hand that smites them—

And crook the pregnant hinges of the knees,
Where thrift may follow fawning—

to their brethren of the South, who love them only to use them.

Now, sir, I want to say simply this, that those men and those boys who left wives, children, and sweethearts, who left the plow, who left the pulpit, who left the office, who left the shop, who left everything that was dear to them in life and went out from 1861 to 1865 to maintain the integrity and supremacy of this Government, were right, and I want to declare in this presence to-night that every man who opposed the flag, who fought against the Government, was everlastingly and will be everlastingly and eternally wrong. [Applause.] I know the holy principles and high motives which filled the hearts and actuated these men and boys of the North in the great struggle for human liberty and union. I know, sir, that in every nation and in every clime men have fought and died for liberty. I know that the Frenchman has stood behind his barricades in the streets of Paris and fought against the autocratic rule of kings and emperors. I know that the German has stood by his castles upon the Rhine and guarded them against those who sought to take away that which his fathers had gained and held. I know that the negroes under Toussaint l'Ouverture fought on their island for liberty, and patriots are fighting now in their island home of Cuba in order that liberty may have another resting place in the Western Hemisphere and in the isles of the western ocean. I know that the Scots have fought upon the hills of Scotland and with Bruce at Bannockburn that they might stand on their native heath and claim their country free. [Applause.] I know that Ireland, poor, downtrodden, and oppressed, has ever stood for liberty, and the daily prayer of every Irishman is that his green isle may once again become one of the nations of the earth; and I know further that in years gone by, during the great famine in Ireland, when the slaveholders of the South raised a large sum of money and sent it to that grand Irishman, Daniel O'Connell, to relieve the struggling poor of Ireland, he sent it back to them in scorn, with this message:

Ireland is poor—God knows she is—but she is not so poor that she will accept money to relieve her starving people which was earned by the unrequited toil of the slave.

[Applause.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am honestly and candidly and heartily in favor of paying a pension to every man who served in the grand army of the Republic, if he needs it [applause]; and, furthermore, to every widow of every soldier and to every dependent orphan of every soldier who served in that Army.

Go out into the great States of the West, and you gentlemen who stand in this House as you do stand here, and who think that this country extends no further toward the setting sun than Oakland or Deer Park, in Maryland, go out into the West, where many of these soldiers live, and witness their sufferings, their trials, and their struggles, and you will come back here and grant them more liberal pensions. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, some of our friends in the House do not seem to realize the fact that in the great West there are men who fought from 1861 to 1865, and who to-day have their wives and their children about them, and the widows who were wives of soldiers during the war, many of whom are to-day suffering for the comforts of life. There are in the district I have the honor to humbly represent on this floor about seven or eight thousand of them. Some are provided for, but the great majority, who gave from one to five years of the best days of their lives in the service of their country, receive very small pensions and are to-day actually suffering for the very necessities of life because this Pension Office—this office of circumlocution—has so surrounded the claimants with frivolous technicalities that they can not comply with the conditions required and are therefore denied pensions to which they are entitled.

I believe that the Commissioner of Pensions was a good soldier and that he wants to do everything that is necessary for the benefit of the soldiers of the Union and remove the snags that stand in the way of the progress of their pension claims. The bill that is now before this committee will have the same effect as sending a snagboat up the Ohio or Mississippi River; it will take out every snag and give a free channel and a straight road to every pensioner who has an honest claim before the Pension Department. Now, Mr. Speaker, I believe that every soldier, that every widow of a soldier, should have such pension as would purchase for them at least the necessities of life. [Applause.] This army that went out from 1861 to 1865 was composed of 2,700,000 men. They were the flower of the Republic and were prompted in the mighty deeds they wrought during those four years of war by a spirit of patriotism, and their sacrifices and sufferings have made the nation they saved their eternal debtor. [Applause.]

While we can not pay the debt in full, we can acquit ourselves of the obligation in part by seeing that no soldier and no family of a dead soldier shall ever know want; that his widow, whether he died in line of duty or not, shall have more than a pittance doled out to her; that she shall not be confined to rules of proof at times impossible for her to comply with; that dependent parents shall not be shut off because thirty years ago they were not dependent. We can see that the disabled soldier is taken care of, whether disabled in line of duty or otherwise. We can see that the 15,000 surviving comrades in the poorhouses of the land are relieved. All these are wards of the nation. If the Republic demands love and loyalty she must care for those who suffered and for the widows and helpless orphans of those who sacrificed their lives for her. They died to preserve this nation and make men free. Their widows and orphans, and the surviving soldiers of the Republic must have thrown around them the fostering care of the Government they suffered and died to save, not in a niggardly, empty-handed manner, but in a full, heaping measure, and may God speed the day when the spirit of Lincoln, of Grant, of Garfield, and of Oliver P. Morton shall again prevail throughout the land, and the high places in the seats of National Government shall once more be filled by those who sought to save and not to destroy the nation's life.

The soldiers of the Union were comrades in the greatest army ever assembled upon earth since the beginning of modern warfare. In the four years of unceasing battle this Army participated in more than 2,000 actual engagements. The conflict from first to last armed nearly 3,000,000 men. The Army subsisted during the four years of war in the open field on a continuous advance over the fortified territory of a brave and powerful enemy. It was compelled to accept for its battlefield those places selected by the foe and carefully prepared to resist attack. Added to this, it kept up an almost unbroken line of battle more than 1,500 miles in length, presenting a spectacle of war of so great and wonderful magnitude that it stands without a parallel in history or tradition. Nearly a million lives were offered up as willing sacrifices on the altar of American liberty. The war for the Union was the completion of the work left unfinished to us by the Revolutionary fathers. They left us the blot of slavery on the escutcheon of American liberty. The South boasted of its wealth piled up by the unrequited toil of the slave. The plaintive wail of the bondman made discord in the harmony of the nation. Every starry banner that floated in the heavens had the slave pen and the whipping post for a background. We boasted of our freedom, and the civilized world pointed the finger of scorn at us and denounced us as a nation of liars. The day of national retribution was here. The prophecy of Lincoln was to be fulfilled: "Every drop of blood drawn by the lash was to be paid by one drawn by the sword, and every dollar accumulated by the unrequited toil of the slave was to be scattered like chaff to the four corners of the earth." The supreme moment had arrived. Popular government was to be tested in the crucible of civil war. God had called his servant Lincoln to become the herald of liberty, the savior of a nation, the emancipator of a race.

This nation could not endure half slave and half free. Freedom cried out for aid in the midnight of her despair, and 2,000,000 patriots sprang to her rescue. The clash of arms was heard throughout the world, and the host of liberty marched to victory through the red sea of war. The cause of the Union was the cause of mankind. The soldiers of the Union shot to death the monster of slavery and disunion. They drove treason from its fortified citadels and proclaimed a new doctrine of liberty to the world, and here I pour out my full measure of gratitude upon the altar of my adopted country to these men who suffered and who died that there might be erected on this earth one great nation, the foundation stone of which is the eternal liberty of the citizen and the equality of all men before the law; the only nation, sir, which grants to the citizen absolute liberty of conscience, of action, and of religion, to be exercised by all alike under wise and beneficent laws; the only Government, Mr. Speaker, "of the people, by the people, and for the people" that has had an abiding place in the universe since the Almighty hurled this earth ball into infinite space, and one which I believe will continue to exist and be a guiding hand and an inspiration of liberty to all the nations of the world until the stars shall sing together and time shall be no more. And, Mr. Speaker, all that stands for freedom, for liberty, for greatness, for unity in this mighty nation of ours to-day is largely owing to the deeds wrought by those defenders of the Republic who stood by Old Glory and battled for God, for home, and native land during that great epoch in our country's history—from 1861 to 1865—and nothing that a grateful Government can give is too good for those of that noble army of heroes who still remain and for the widows of those who have gone beyond; and he who in this time of peace, living in the full enjoyment of the blessings won by the sacrifices and shed blood of the Union soldier, grudges to him his meager pension is an enemy to his country, bereft of patriotism and dead to gratitude. [Applause.]

[Mr. GIBSON addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to give notice that I propose to offer the bill just referred to by the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, by way of two additional sections, to be numbered 18 and 19, but identical with the bill reported by Mr. CROWTHER, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions. I desire to give that notice now. The proposed new sections are as follows:

SEC. 18. That the provisions of existing pension laws are hereby extended to the officers and enlisted men, their widows, children, dependent mothers and fathers, of all militia raised in the several States during the years 1861 to 1865, inclusive, who performed military service in the Federal Army, or when serving with United States volunteers or regulars, or when serving as State militia under the orders or command of the War Department or any military officer of the United States, during a period of ninety days or longer, and that a certificate of discharge from such service from either State or United States authority shall be prima facie evidence of such service.

SEC. 19. That the following provisions of paragraph 3, section 4983, Revised Statutes of the United States, to wit: "But no claim of a militiaman or non-enlisted person on account of disability from wounds or injury received in battle with rebels or Indians while temporarily rendering service shall be valid unless prosecuted to a successful issue prior to the 4th day of July, 1874," be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

[Mr. WHEELER addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I have listened with great interest to the remarks of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER]. When he speaks about the friendship of the Democratic party for the old soldiers and of the large appropriations made by that party of which he is a member to pay pensions, I would like to ask him what party wrote the laws upon the statute books which called for those large appropriations? Every one of them was written thereby the Republican party and not by the Democratic party, and he knows it. [Applause on the Republican side.] There has never been but one Republican vote cast against a general pension law since 1861, and that was cast by a Representative from Florida.

The gentleman talks about the large appropriations made by the Democratic party for pensions for the old soldiers. If the Democratic party did make those appropriations, I ask the gentleman whether the appropriations they made were not made to carry out the act of 1890, which was passed by the Republicans? And I remind him that after having appropriated ten millions less than the last Republican Congress his party, by failing to properly carry out that law, covered back into the Treasury $11,000,000 of that pension appropriation which should have been paid to the old soldiers. [Applause on the Republican side.] If your party is the friend of the old soldier, I ask you, General WHEELER, why it is that they have reduced the pension expenditure so that eighteen millions less was dispersed for the last year than for the year ended June 30, 1893, and why they paid out twenty-one millions less than the Republicans estimated would be required? [Applause.] In reply to a question by the gentleman from South Dakota, you challenged him to name a case where this Administration had done injustice to an old soldier. I give you the name of a man, B. H. Yonker, late Company D, Third Indiana, certificate 229749, who, according to reports of the medical examiners appointed by this Administration, is rated fifty-eightieths, yet they decline to give him a pension under the new law. He drew $2 a month under the old law. He applied under the new law and was rated at fifty-eightieths—

Mr. PICKLER. That means $50 a month.

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. Yes; and they refused the pension which he is entitled to under the new law.

But that is not all. You say that there are no other cases, and that this Administration does justice to the old soldiers. I can give the name of another man, J. D. Muller, late Company L, Thirtieth Missouri, certificate 553895, who was drawing a pension of $12 a month by virtue of a bill passed by a Republican Congress and signed by a Republican President. [Applause on the Republican side.] The medical examiners rated him at twelve-eightieths for one disability, twelve-eightieths for another, and four-eightieths for another; and yet your Administration, which you say is so friendly to the soldiers, reduced his pension from $12 to $8 a month, notwithstanding the fact that two reputable physicians testified that he was totally unable to perform manual labor. And yet you claim that justice is done to the old soldier!

But, more than that, Mr. Speaker; take the report of the Commissioner of Pensions within a period of one year and two months—that is to say, from March, 1893, to May, 1894—and you will find that they dropped, suspended, or reduced over 15,000 pensioners in that period, and yet of their own accord, compelled by public sentiment, they were forced to restore over 9,500 of these men to the rolls. [Applause.]

Another thing. Your President proclaimed in a message to the Fifty-third Congress "that thousands of neighborhoods have their well-known fraudulent pensioners," and yet do you know that in the report of 1895 your Commissioner of Pensions says that there have been only a little over 500 cases recommended for prosecution and only 294 convictions out of a total roll of 970,000? [Prolonged applause.] Think of that condition of affairs, General, and then if you can repeat the statement that this Administration is friendly to the old soldiers. You can not do it. [Applause.]

Mr. CROWTHER. And but thirty-nine of them were old soldiers.

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. And as suggested by my friend from Missouri, only thirty-nine of that whole number were old soldiers. But that is not all. That demonstrated what the Republicans have always claimed, that the pension roll of this country is a roll of honor. [Applause.] But when I read that infamous statement of the President of the United States, and then when I look at that record, I conclude that the statement was not only untrue and unjust, but it was unmanly, and came with bad grace from a man who was not brave enough to shoulder his musket in the defense of his country, but did his fighting by a substitute. [Applause.] General, do you want any more of the record of your party? [Laughter.] If you do, I can name for you case after case.

But, Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to talk upon this measure to-night. I did not intend to say anything, but having listened to the speeches made this afternoon, especially that by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARTLETT], and I am sorry he is not here this evening. He criticised the bill, and said that there was not a provision of it that was good. He objected to that section of the bill particularly which provides that the widows of soldiers shall come under the new law where their income is less than $300 a year. He says, just think of giving a woman a pension of $8 a month who has already an income of $300 a year! Then I thought of the statement he made more than two years ago on this floor, when he told us what a great sacrifice he was making in coming to Congress when he had an income from his law practice of $25,000 a year. And I thought what a big heart that man must have who would begrudge the granting of a pension of $8 a month to a poor widow when he received more in one day from his income than she would receive in one long year.

Mr. SULLOWAY. If he did.

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. Yes; if he did.

But I want to say to you, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, that the man who can listen without feeling to the appeal of the widows and the old soldiers of this country—the man who can listen without feeling to their appeals must have a heart that an X ray could not penetrate. [Applause.] He stated to the House this afternoon that the people "were against the enlargement of the pension laws"; that Congress had gone far enough. I want to call his attention to this fact: On the 23d day of May, 1865, the old soldiers marched down Pennsylvania avenue, and as they came to the Treasury building they saw on that building a canvas containing these words: "There is one debt the Government owes which it can never pay, and that is the debt it owes to soldiers and sailors who served the Union." [Applause.]

That was the sentiment of the country then, and, Mr. Speaker, that is the sentiment of this country to-day [applause], and it will always be the sentiment of the country. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I do not like the way this bill is limited. I think the trouble with the bill is that it does not go far enough; and that is the sentiment in the section of country that I have the honor to represent on this floor. The old soldiers of this country, those who took part in that war which saved the Union, have waited a long and weary time, and have waited long enough. [Applause.] They are entitled to more than this bill gives them; and I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Alabama to the fact that as every general pension law ever written upon the statute books was written there by Republican votes in the House and Senate, so that party, when restored to power again, as it will be on the 4th of March, 1897 [applause on the Republican side], will do full justice to every old soldier, and to the widow of every old soldier, and to the orphan of every old soldier in this country. [Applause.] And one of its first acts will be to right the wrongs this Administration has done to the brave defenders of this country. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. MAHANY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to pay my respects to the gentleman from New York who criticised this bill this afternoon.

Mr. PICKLER. To which gentleman do you refer?

Mr. MAHANY. I refer to the gentleman from New York, Mr. BARTLETT, and I will take for my text one criticism which he passed upon the rhetoric of my remarks delivered on Thursday last. This gentleman, whose legal ability has been exploited with such sarcasm in the speech of the gentleman who has just preceded me [Mr. CURTIS of Kansas], is unquestionably eminent in his profession. If you doubt it, you can be convinced, for he admits it. [Laughter.] In the course of my remarks I said that the men of this generation are the inheritors of the splendid and inspiring possibilities of this Republic, a heritage secured to us through the sacrifices of the heroes who gave their lives for the preservation of the Union. The gentleman from New York, whose acute legal mind nets him an income, according to his own confession, of $25,000 a year, ignores the greater question of justice to the nation's dead and living benefactors, in order to quibble on a point of rhetoric, a subject regarding which his knowledge seems to be as vague as his legal lore is supposed to be profound. He stakes his reputation, legal and rhetorical, on the statement that one can not inherit a possibility.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I think he is the most striking illustration of that fact, because he inherited at birth the possibility of making himself an irritating figure in the pension legislation of this country—a possibility which he has fully realized to the perception of everybody but himself. When he says that one can not inherit a possibility, he strikes down the noblest ideal of this Republic, because to a boy born in poverty and confronted by all the obstacles which that condition involves, there is only one precious thing which he does inherit, and that is the possibility of rising from that condition. In the beautiful language of Tennyson, he is—

The heir of all the ages, in the foremost files of time.

Why, Mr. Speaker, it is possibility, and possibility alone, that glorifies American citizenship. It is the gift which the fathers of the Revolution and the preservers of the Union gave as their legacy to posterity. I do not expect that the gentleman from New York, whose disposition leads him, unconsciously, perhaps, to harass helpless pensioners, will understand an inheritance of that kind. Apparently he recognizes only such as have a rating in commercial agencies.

But in a broader sense the possibility of bettering our conditions, of having all the doors of honor swing wide to merit, is the best heritage conferred upon Americans by the worthies of an elder day. Compare, in this respect, our citizenship with that of other lands. Take the poor German peasant, and contrast his condition with that of the German Emperor, the most powerful monarch in the world. The peasant has no possibility of breaking down the obstacles that confront him in his hope of progress. Think of the German Emperor on the other hand, who, rising above the counts, the dukes, the princes, and the federated kings, towers into such a height of power and glory as almost to invest him with the attributes of a god. Yet that same German peasant, emigrating to the United States, may have born to him here a son who fifty years thereafter may become the President of the United States and deal on terms of absolute equality with the Sovereign of Germany. That is a possibility which Americans inherit from the statesmen who framed and the heroes who preserved the American Republic. I desire to call that fact to the attention of the gentleman from New York. [Applause.] His apparent inability to understand the genius and the instinct of this people is shown in the spirit that animated his criticism; and his failure to recognize the higher truths involved in this discussion proves how unsuited he is to pass upon the merits of a pension measure.

In these questions neither politics nor prejudice should have any part. I wish to say that, so far as I am personally concerned, I have the profoundest respect for every man who honestly and nobly fought in defense of his sincere convictions on the other side. But it is, indeed, a subject for astonishment in the latter days of the nineteenth century, when all the splendid and glorious accomplishments of humanity seem to conspire to realize the original dreams of paradise upon this earth, that in the forum of the foremost nation in the world, we should behold a man standing here, weighing with an apothecary's scale the sacrifices and the sufferings of those who made his own success possible. The genius and the inspiration of this people are unalterably against such petulant and captious opposition to the justice which is due to those whose heroic and hallowed service secured freedom to all mankind. [Applause.]

And then, on motion of Mr. PICKLER (at 10 o'clock and 4 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

REPUBLICAN FORM OF GOVERNMENT IN ALABAMA.

Mr. CHANDLER. In behalf of the Committee on Privileges and Elections I submit, as I gave notice on Saturday I should do, a supplemental report to accompany Senate resolution 54. I ask that this supplemental report, together with the first report, No. 447, submitted March 10, 1896, may be printed together; that there be a reprint of the original report with the supplemental report.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered.

Mr. ALLEN. I ask that the supplemental report be read at this time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska calls for the reading of the supplemental report. The Secretary will read as requested.

Mr. CHANDLER. I suggest, instead of having the report read and delaying the morning business, that the Senator from Nebraska modify his request so as to have it printed in the RECORD.

Mr. ALLEN. That will be satisfactory.

Mr. COCKRELL. As well as a separate document.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered.

The supplemental report is as follows:

The Committee on Privileges and Elections made a report in favor of the resolution of inquiry on March 10, 1896 (Senate Report No. 447), at which time notice was given that there would be a minority report opposing the resolution. That minority report is not forthcoming after a lapse of forty-eight days. The majority of the committee, therefore, add a supplemental statement, as follows:

At the State election in Alabama in August, 1894, as appears by the statements made in the majority report of March 10, William C. Oates, instead of being elected by 27,582 votes, was defeated and Reuben F. Kolb elected by about 7,000 majority, the apparent election being secured by an enormously fictitious vote, reaching 34,000 fraudulently returned from certain counties as having been cast for Mr. Oates.

The report of March 10 also states that the rejection of fraudulent returns would have given the supporters of Mr. Kolb a majority of the members of the legislature. But as the details of this claim were not given, its truth has been vigorously denied by the supporters of Mr. Oates, and it has been claimed that even if there was an actual majority for Mr. Kolb for governor, still there can be no plausible claim that Mr. Oates's supporters did not choose a lawful majority of the legislature which elected Senator Morgan. In refutation of this assertion, occasion is taken in this supplemental report to state the claim as to the legislature made by Mr. Kolb and his supporters.

First, we recapitulate the claim made by the petitioners for the inquiry as to the popular vote for governor. The speech of the Senator from Nebraska, Mr. ALLEN, made in the Senate, February 11, 1896, contained the following statement of the popular vote in the black-belt counties:

Black-belt counties.	State election, August, 1894.
	Votes counted.	Vote (estimated) actually cast.	Estimated fraudulent vote.
Autauga	1,113	340	773
Barbour	4,004	1,242	2,762
Bullock	2,601	795	1,806
Clarke	2,969	905	2,064
Dallas	6,684	2,045	4,639
Greene	1,045	319	726
Hale	3,107	960	2,147
Lowndes	5,356	1,638	3,718
Monroe	2,074	634	1,440
Montgomery	5,210	1,594	3,616
Marengo	3,852	1,178	2,674
Perry	1,073	511	1,162
Russell	1,680	517	1,163
Sumter	2,251	688	1,563
Wilcox	6,401	1,956	4,445
Total	50,080	15,315	34,765
			15,315
			50,080

While Senator ALLEN in the above table estimates the fraudulent vote in the 15 counties at 34,765, he does not state the votes returned from those counties and counted for Oates and Kolb, respectively.

The following table does show the counted returns in those counties:

Counties.	Oates.	Kolb.
Autauga	776	397
Barbour	3,407	657
Bullock	2,309	292
Clarke	1,831	1,128
Dallas	6,517	167
Greene	846	199
Lowndes	2,725	282
Monroe	4,985	361
Montgomery	1,650	434
Marengo	4,930	280
Perry	2,808	1,044
Russell	1,184	489
Sumter	1,271	419
Wilcox	1,843	406
	6,270	131
Total	43,362	6,718
		50,080

There has been no pretense that any of the 6,718 votes for Mr. Kolb in these counties were fraudulent. Deduct, therefore, the fraudulent vote of 34,765 from the vote returned for Mr. Oates of 43,362, and Oates received only 8,597 actual votes, which, added to 6,718, the number cast for Mr. Kolb, make 15,315, being the number stated by Senator ALLEN as the vote actually cast.

The 34,765 fraudulent votes returned for Mr. Oates overcome the 27,582 majority by which he was declared elected and show the election of Mr. Kolb by about 7,000 majority.

We now proceed to show what was the actual lawful result as to the legislature.

A table of the 14 black-belt counties, with the number of Democratic senators and representatives who sat in the legislature, is as follows:

Counties.	Senators.	Representatives.
Autauga*	1	1
Barbour*	1	3
Bullock	1	2
Dallas	1	3
Greene	1	1
Hale	1	2
Lowndes*	1	2
Macon*	1	1
Marengo	1	1
Montgomery	1	4
Perry	1	1
Russell	1	1
Sumter	1	1
Total	8	25

There was false registration and ballot-box stuffing in the 14 counties and innumerable fraudulent returns, which might invalidate all the elections and reject all the members. At all events, it is beyond doubt that Populist or Republican members were actually elected in the 4 counties marked with a star, namely: Autauga, Barbour, Lowndes, and Macon, two senators and seven representatives.

A table showing the white counties, where the Populist or Republican candidates were chosen, but the Democratic candidates were fraudulently declared elected, is as follows:

Counties.	Senators.	Representatives.
Calhoun	2	2
Clarke	2	2
Colbert	1	2
Henry	2	2
Jefferson	2	5
Madison	1	2
Monroe	1	1
Morgan	2	2
Pickens	1	1
Pike	2	2
Talladega*	1	1
Tuscaloosa	1	2
Total	4	24

* And one Populist.

Now, to apply the foregoing facts. The Alabama legislature as it actually assembled showed 45 Democratic majority, according to the following table:

Total membership:
House	100
Senate	33
			133
	Republicans and Populists.	Democrats.	Total.
Senate	9	24	33
House	35	65	100

Or 45 Democratic majority.

A revision of the result, eliminating the frauds in the 12 white counties and the 4 black counties, in accordance with the above tables, gives a Populist and Republican majority of 29, as follows:

	Republicans and Populists.		Democrats.
	Senate.	House.	Senate.	House.
Result changed by fraud in 12 white counties	9	35	24	65
	4	24	4	24
Result changed by fraud in 4 black counties	13	50	20	41
	2	7	2	7
Total	15	60	19	34

Total Republicans and Populists, 81; total Democrats, 52; total, 133. Populist and Republican majority, 29.

The foregoing claims of the petitioners for the investigation have been shown to the committee to be apparently correct. Whether or not they are in fact correct can only be determined by the inquiry which Mr. Oates and his supporters so persistently avoid.

There would seem to be little doubt of the correctness of the facts charged, in the light of the admissions made in an article in the Times of December 6, 1895, published by J. M. Anderson and J. J. Townsend, at Selma, Dallas County, Ala., which is the home of Senator MORGAN. The excuse which Messrs. Anderson and Townsend give for the crimes which they acknowledge were committed, namely, that they are necessary to prevent negro domination, is wholly refuted by the fact that both in 1892 and 1894 the Jones and Oates Democracy were overwhelmingly defeated in the white counties of the State. The "manufactured majorities," which the Selma Times says, "the young men of the black belt are weary of going into the ballot boxes and bringing up," have not been manufactured in order to prevent negro domination, but in order to enable a minority faction of the white voters to hold in subjection the majority of the white voters. The article in the Selma Times is as follows:

[Selma Times, published at Selma, Dallas County, Ala.]

A CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION.

The Times believes that the time has arrived for the holding of a constitutional convention in Alabama in order to regulate the franchise. The white and black vote of Alabama is very nearly equally divided, and with a "free ballot and a fair count" there would be negro officers filling every office in one-third of the counties in Alabama, and that would necessitate a standing army to keep down riot and a war between the races. That we do not want.

The Times is one of those papers that does not believe it is any harm to rob or appropriate the vote of an illiterate negro. We do not believe they ought ever to have had the privilege of voting. This right was given or forced upon them and the white people by the bayonet, and the first law of nature, self-preservation, gives us the right to do anything to keep our race and civilization from being wiped off the face of the earth. It was, and still is, a cruelty to both races to arm the grossly ignorant with the ballot—the highest privilege of freemen. No man, after thirty years of taxation and effort to educate him, has a right to be too ignorant to vote intelligently. Right here we will state that we are in favor of keeping the white man on top—it matters not what means are resorted to—but it must be done. With Pet Caffee we believe that "if it is necessary to protect the women and children of Lowndes County and of Alabama, my county will continue to bring up 4,999 Democratic majority." He is our kind of a Democrat under the present order of things.

We hope, however, to see these things changed. The only way to do so is to adopt the Mississippi plan. The only way to reach that plan is through a constitutional convention. The young men of the black belt are weary of going into the ballot boxes and bringing up manufactured majorities in order to keep from being ruined by negroes, or what is worse, by unscrupulous white men leading the black hordes to the polls. We need a change—we must have a change.

A constitutional convention can do an intelligent man no harm in restricting the ballot. The unlettered white man and the ignorant negro will be on the same footing as to the ballot, but excluding both would be a powerful educational uplifting stimulant. If either would vote they must study. An educational qualification will fire their ambition, and as a consequence a better citizenship would result.

A constitutional convention to restrict suffrage is a necessity at this time. We are for it.

OYSTER BEDS IN RARITAN BAY.

Mr. PERKINS. I am directed by the Committee on Fisheries, to whom was referred the bill (S. 357) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to appoint commissioners to estimate damages done to planted oysters and oyster beds in Raritan Bay and adjoining waters in New York and New Jersey, and to make compensation therefor, to report a joint resolution. The joint resolution is short, and I ask to have it considered at this time.

The joint resolution (S. R. 139) directing the Secretary of War to cause an investigation to be made respecting the claims of certain citizens of New York and New Jersey that damages were done to their planted oysters and oyster beds in Raritan Bay by dredges and other vessels in the employ of the United States, and to report the circumstances relating thereto, was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to cause an investigation to be made respecting the claims of certain citizens of the States of New York and New Jersey that damages were done to their planted oysters and oyster beds in Raritan Bay and adjacent waters by dredges, scows, and other vessels in the employ of the United States Government from the 1st day of January, 1880, to the 1st day of January, 1892, and to report in full the circumstances relating thereto.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Senate bill 357 will be postponed indefinitely.

QUIN NE MO SE.

Mr. WILSON. If the morning business has closed, I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 1704) for the relief of Quin ne mo se, an Indian.

Mr. HALE. Is the morning business over?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning business is not yet concluded. The Senator from Washington asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill indicated by him.

Mr. HALE. I desire as soon as the routine morning business is completed to ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the naval appropriation bill. I shall not object to this bill if it gives rise to no debate, but after that I shall call for the regular order, and ask to be recognized at the completion of the routine business.

Mr. GEAR. I ask the Senator from Maine kindly to give way for a moment after the Senator from Washington gets his bill through. I have a little bill that will take no time.

Mr. HALE. I ask the Senator from Iowa to wait until I get the appropriation bill up, and then I will yield.

Mr. GEAR. Very well.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Washington calls up a bill which will be read for information.

The Secretary read the bill (S. 1704) for the relief of Quin ne mo se, an Indian, which had been reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with amendments.

Mr. CHILTON. I have no objection to the consideration of the bill, but I have an amendment pending that I would like to have read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HALE. If the bill gives rise to any debate I must object to it.

Mr. WILSON. If the Senator from Maine will allow me, I will state that the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas I propose to accept, and the bill will not lead to any debate, although the adoption of the amendment will cause the Interior Department to send a special agent to the State of Washington to examine the land. I shall accept the amendment, however.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. CHILTON. Let my amendment be stated, and then I will explain it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendments of the Committee on Indian Affairs will first be stated.

The first amendment was, in section 1, line 16, after the word "removed," to insert:

And the fee simple to said above-described real estate is hereby vested in the said Quin ne mo se, his heirs and assigns, forever.

So as to make the section read:

That the restrictions imposed by the act of Congress approved January 18, 1881, upon homestead certificate No. 763, dated the 8th day of June, 1888, granting to Quin ne mo se, an Indian, the southeast quarter of the southeast quarter, and the lot numbered 4, of section 34; the southwest quarter of the southwest quarter of section 34, all in township 25 north; and the west half of lot numbered 5 and lot numbered 4, of section 3, in township 24, north of range 45 east of the Willamette meridian, in the State of Washington, containing 167½ acres, be, and the same are hereby, removed, and the fee simple to said above-described real estate is hereby vested in the said Quin ne mo se, his heirs and assigns, forever.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out section 2, in the following words:

SEC. 2. That the said Quin ne mo se shall, with the consent of the Secretary of the Interior, have the right to alienate the title to said lands above mentioned: Provided, That whenever the said Quin ne mo se shall so alienate the title to said lands the same shall be subject to judgment, decree, and order of any court of competent jurisdiction and shall be subject to taxation; and that none of the provisions of the act of Congress approved January 18, 1881, shall apply to said lands after the alienation of the title thereof as hereinbefore provided.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment submitted by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CHILTON] will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the bill the following proviso:

Provided, That said lands shall not be alienated by said Quin ne mo se or his heirs without the previous permission of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. WILSON. I accept that amendment.

Mr. CHILTON. The Senator from Washington has stated, I believe, that the adoption of the amendment will require the sending of a special agent to the State of Washington to determine upon the suggestion contained in the amendment. I will state that the amendment was prepared after communication with the Interior Department. I have here a letter from the Secretary of the Interior written some time ago to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, but which contains his present views on the subject, in which he states his unwillingness to have this Indian resume his tribal relations, and under such circumstances it seems a wise thing to subject the sale of the Indian's homestead to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, I will read the letter. It is very short. The Secretary of the Interior says:

I have considered your communication of the 10th instant in the matter of the application of Quin ne mo se, an Indian, of De Smet, Idaho, requesting permission of Congress to sell and dispose of certain lands patented to him under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1876, by the removal of the "restrictive clause" contained therein.

The Indian states that in 1865 he made a final proof on his homestead entry and patent was issued to him in due course of time; that the settlement of that part of the country is so complete that his property is surrounded on all sides by white people; that he was unable to send his children to school and was therefore compelled to abandon his home and remove to the Coeur d'Alene Reservation in Idaho, and as his lands are some distance from that reservation, and as he is unable to give them proper attention, he petitions Congress for permission to sell and dispose of the same by removal of the "restrictive clause" in his patent.

That is the effect of the bill which the Senator from Washington has called up.

Your letter shows that Quin ne mo se homesteaded these lands under the provisions contained in the act of March 3, 1876—"That any Indian born in the United States who is the head of a family or who has arrived at the age of 21 years and who has abandoned or who may hereafter abandon his tribal relations shall, on making satisfactory proof of such abandonment under rules to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, be entitled to the benefits of the act entitled 'An act to secure homesteads to actual settlers on the public domain,' approved May 20, 1862, and the acts amendatory thereof, except that the provision of the eighth section of said act shall not be held to apply to entries made under this act"—and that patent was issued to him June 8, 1883, upon the express condition that the title thereby conveyed should not be subject to alienation or incumbrance, either by a voluntary conveyance or by judgment, decree or order of any court, or subject to taxation of any character, but should remain inalienable and not subject to taxation for a period of twenty years from the date thereof.

Legislation looking to the breaking up of tribal relations among Indians was recommended by the Secretary of the Interior in his annual report for 1874 (page 7).

The Secretary said: "A common ownership of property is the normal condition of the Indian race, and with it are found nomadic habits totally inconsistent with the idea of permanent habitations, individual ownership, and domestic industry. The work of civilization can never be completed until these habits are abandoned. Every proper inducement, therefore, ought to be offered the Indian which will prompt him to individual ownership of property and such habits of industry and economy as are incident to our civilization. * * * An extension to the Indians of the benefits of the homestead laws under the safeguards mentioned and such others as the wisdom of Congress may suggest will greatly facilitate the work of their civilization. It will break up tribal organizations and Indian communities; it will bring Indians into subjection to our laws, civil and criminal; it will induce them to abandon roving habits and teach them the benefits of industry and individual ownership, and then prove highly advantageous in promoting their prosperity"; and Congress, concurring in the views of the Department, passed the Indian homestead act of 1876.

Quin ne mo se—

Who is the individual Indian mentioned in the bill—

Quin ne mo se, in order to obtain this homestead, must have made satisfactory proof that he had abandoned his tribal relations and by this action become a citizen of the United States, entitled to all the rights, privileges, and immunities of such citizens without in any manner impairing or otherwise affecting his right to tribal or other property as provided by the act of February 8, 1876 (24 Stats., 388), and having become a citizen—

And now comes the point of this letter—and having become a citizen I am unable to see how he can be reinstated as an Indian in tribal relations, except by a departure from the well-established policy of the Government as declared in the act of 1876, supra, and other acts of Congress providing for the allotting of lands to Indians with the view of making them citizens of the United States.

Quin ne mo se has no right on the Coeur d'Alene Reservation except as provided by the act of 1887; and having abandoned his tribal relations and taken his home on the public domain he has no right to remain on said reservation. He is a citizen of the United States, and his home is on the lands patented to him.

For this reason I must decline to recommend to Congress that he be allowed to sell his lands and to return to the Coeur d'Alene Reservation and become an Indian in tribal relations.

I read this letter merely to show that my amendment is in the line of precaution which the views of the Interior Department makes necessary. It will commit to that Department the matter of permitting this Indian to sell his lands. If he is permitted to return to the reservation I presume he will be allowed to dispose of his land. I have no objection whatever to the bill with that limitation, and the Senator from Washington having agreed to accept it, it can be passed without hindrance.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, a single word in reply to the letter just read by the Senator from Texas.

It makes no difference whether the Secretary of the Interior is unwilling that Quin ne mo se shall abandon his land or not, because Quin ne mo se abandoned the land five years ago. Whether the Secretary is unwilling or not, he can accomplish nothing by interposing his objection. The Indian was compelled and forced to abandon his land. He has gone back to the Coeur d'Alene Reservation. He is residing there among his people. He is a farmer. He tills the soil, and is trying to educate his children there. He can not live upon this land, and has not lived upon it for five years. It is not very valuable. It is probably worth five or six hundred dollars. He is old, and wishes to sell it and avail himself of the means that he will acquire thereby.

I accept the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CHILTON. I do not wish to protract this discussion, because it is now purely a moot debate; yet I wish to call the attention of the Senate to one point. If this Indian has left his home and has gone on the Coeur d'Alene Reservation, he has done so without the consent of the Interior Department. It rests with the Department at any time to remove him from that reservation. It is entirely proper, therefore, that before he parts with his land he should have the consent of the Interior Department. That is all the amendment provides for. It is merely in the line of the universal policy which has prevailed in regard to lands allotted to individual Indians. It merely requires that this ward of the nation shall obtain executive consent before alienating his homestead, and thus be protected both in receiving a fair price and in regard to other surroundings of the trade. The old rule was that the President's consent was required. Since that time there has been a modification of the practice, so that the Secretary of the Interior is now usually entitled to consent. I am not aware of any case where Indians have been allowed to sell their land without some order of Executive consent. My amendment is merely in the line of safeguarding the matter.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM H. TIBBITS.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE. Now let the naval appropriation bill be read for action on the committee amendments.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 7542) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill. The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 2, line 7, after the word "action," to strike out the following additional proviso:

Provided further, That all officers who have been or may be appointed to any corps of the Navy or to the Marine Corps after service in a different corps of the Navy or of the Marine Corps shall have all the benefits of their previous service in the same manner as if said appointments were a reentry into the Navy or into the Marine Corps.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 6, line 12, after the word "same," to strike out "eight thousand" and insert "including one draftsman, at $1,200, nine thousand two hundred"; so as to make the clause read:

Naval War College and Torpedo School on Coasters Harbor Island, Rhode Island: For maintenance of the Naval War College and Torpedo School on Coasters Harbor Island, and care of grounds for same, including one draftsman, at $1,200, $9,200.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, line 21, after the word "dollars," to insert: "Provided, That the Secretary of the Navy may, in his discretion, purchase by contract all or any part of such guns"; so as to make the clause read:

Reserve guns for auxiliary cruisers: Toward the armament of modern guns for auxiliary cruisers mentioned in the act approved March 3, 1891, and in section 4 of the act approved May 10, 1892, $250,000: Provided, That the Secretary of the Navy may, in his discretion, purchase by contract all or any part of such guns.

Mr. QUAY. At that point I desire to amend the clause by striking out the words "two hundred and fifty" and inserting "five hundred"; so as to make the appropriation for the armament of modern guns for auxiliary cruisers, according to the estimates of the Department, a half million dollars.

Mr. HALE. The order of the Senate was to first consider committee amendments and take up other amendments afterwards. Will the Senator wait until we get through with the committee amendments to the bill?

Mr. QUAY. Certainly.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will recognize the Senator from Pennsylvania after the committee amendments shall have been concluded. The question is on the amendment which has been read.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in the clause making appropriations for "torpedo station, Newport, R. I.," on page 8, line 15, after the word "dollars," to strike out "Extending" and insert "extending."

To pave Hanover street from Maryland avenue to Wagner street, Wagner street from Hanover street to King George street, and King George street from College avenue to College or Graveyard Creek, in the city of Annapolis, Md., $3,000, in addition to the sum of $13,000 made by the naval appropriation act approved July 28, 1894, which is hereby continued available for the same purpose; and the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to convey to the city of Annapolis, Md., the title to the bed of King George street from College avenue to College or Graveyard Creek.

Mr. HALE. That amendment ought to be perfected by striking out all after the word "purpose," in line 10, as the deed for the property referred to has already been given. I make that motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHANDLER in the chair). The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the amendment, in line 10, after the word "purpose," by striking out—

And the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to convey to the city of Annapolis, Md., the title to the bed of King George street from College avenue to College or Graveyard Creek.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 22, after line 14, to insert:

That the Board of Visitors of the Naval Academy, when visiting said Academy in 1896, shall fully examine into and report to the Secretary of the Navy and to Congress the availability and desirability of acquiring as an annex to the grounds of said Academy so much of the property adjoining thereto in the city of Annapolis as is situate between the north side of Hanover street, the east side of Governor street, the north side of King George street, and the west side of Holland street, and the probable cost thereof by purchase or by condemnation for public use.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 23, line 16, after the word "laboratory," to strike out "and department of instruction, museum; of hygiene"; so as to make the clause read:

Medical department: For surgeons' necessities for vessels in commission, navy-yards, naval stations, Marine Corps, and Coast Survey, and for the civil establishment at the several naval hospitals, navy-yards, naval laboratory, and Naval Academy, $65,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 32, line 2, before the word "repairs," to strike out "other" and insert "order"; so as to read:

Hartford or to order repairs of ships damaged in foreign waters or on the high seas, so far as may be necessary to bring them home.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 33, after line 2, to strike out:

For making plans, examining and preparing the ground and other preliminary work toward the construction of a model tank, with all buildings and appliances, to be built upon the grounds of the old Observatory, Washington, D. C., under the Bureau of Construction and Repair of the Navy Department, which shall conduct therein the work of investigating and determining the most suitable and desirable shapes and forms to be adopted for United States naval vessels, $7,500: Provided, That upon the authorization of the Secretary of the Navy experiments may be made at this establishment for private shipbuilders, who shall defray the cost of material and of labor of per diem employees for such experiments: And provided further, That the results of such private experiments shall be regarded as confidential and shall not be divulged without the consent of the shipbuilder for whom they may be made.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 42, line 3, in the items for contingent expenses, Naval Academy, after the word "dollars," to insert "for contingencies for the Superintendent of the Academy, $1,000," and in line 5, before the word "thousand," to increase the total of the appropriations from $45,400 to $46,400.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 43, after line 2, in the items for the Marine Corps, to strike out:

Pay of 10 sergeants, 40 corporals, 12 drummers, 12 fliers, and 436 privates, to be enlisted in accordance with the provisions of section 1590, Revised Statutes, $74,500, to be immediately available.

Mr. CHANDLER. I suggest to the Senator from Maine that he allow the provisions about the Marine Corps to go over until the reading of the bill is finished.

Mr. HALE. That is very acceptable to me, as there will be some controversy about it.

Mr. LODGE. To what provisions does the Senator refer?

Mr. HALE. All provisions relating to the increase of the Marine Corps. Let them all go over.

Mr. LODGE. There are only three of them.

Mr. HALE. There are three of them. They stand on all fours. If one goes out the others will go.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BACON in the chair). Without objection, the provisions as to the Marine Corps will go over for the present.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill on page 44, line 3.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is it the pleasure of the Senate that these provisions which relate to the Marine Corps shall also be passed over?

Mr. HALE. The amendment on page 45, lines 19 to 23, should be passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clause to which the Chair directs the attention of the Senate begins with line 3, page 45. It relates somewhat to the Marine Corps.

Mr. PLATT. That is the civil force.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate having passed over the preceding provisions relative to the Marine Corps, the Chair desires to know whether it is also the wish of the Senate to have this provision passed over?

Mr. HALE. There is no amendment at that point in my copy of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no amendment. The Chair will suggest that there were no amendments on page 42, under the heading "Marine Corps," which was also passed over. The Chair understood that everything which relates to the Marine Corps was, under the order, to be passed over for the present.

Mr. CHANDLER. The amendment on page 43 was not included in the request.

Mr. HALE. There is no objection to the amendment on page 47 being disagreed to. If it is disagreed to it will leave the text of the bill as it came from the House remain.

Mr. GORMAN. To which amendment does the Senator from Maine refer?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 43, line 20, after the word "dollars," the committee report an amendment to strike out:

And hereafter officers of the Marine Corps traveling under orders without troops shall be allowed the same mileage as is now allowed officers of the Navy traveling without troops.

Mr. CHANDLER. I understand the Senator in charge of the bill to say that there is no objection to having to pay the same in the two cases; that that is the correct rule of payment.

Mr. GORMAN. As I understand it, this is an increase of the traveling expenses of the Marine Corps. They now receive the same expenses that are allowed to army officers. This is an increase. I do not understand that the Senator in charge of the bill desires to have the amendment disagreed to.

Mr. HALE. No; I had in mind the amendment on page 47. This amendment may be agreed to and go into conference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHANDLER. The amendment on pages 45 and 46 have been passed over?

Mr. HALE. They have been passed over.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill on page 46, line 8. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 47, line 7, after the word "dollars," to strike out:

Provided, That the provisions of the clause contained in the act of Congress approved March 3, 1879, authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to make such entries upon the books of the Department as will carry to the credit of certain railroad companies named in said act amounts earned or to be earned by them during each fiscal year on account of transportation of the Army and transportation of the mails be, and the same are hereby, extended and made applicable to the transportation of the Navy and the Marine Corps;

So as to make the clause read:

Transportation and recruiting, Marine Corps: For transportation of troops, including ferrage, and the expense of recruiting service, $15,000.

Mr. GORMAN. I understand this is the amendment which is to be disagreed to.

Mr. HALE. I have no objection to the amendment being disagreed to on papers that have come in since the bill was reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 48, line 24, after the words "District of Columbia," to insert "and for the leader of the Marine Band"; so as to make the clause read:

Hire of quarters, Marine Corps: For hire of quarters for officers serving with troops where there are no public quarters belonging to the Government, and where there are not sufficient quarters possessed by the United States to accommodate them, $4,500; for hire of quarters for 7 enlisted men employed as clerks and messengers in commandant's, adjutant and inspector's, paymaster's, and quartermaster's offices, Washington, D. C., and for the leader of the Marine Band, and assistant quartermaster's offices, Philadelphia, Pa., at $21 per month each, $1,764; for hire of quarters for 3 enlisted men employed as above, at $10 each per month, $300; in all, $6,624.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 50, after line 9, in the items for contingent expenses, Marine Corps, to strike out:

For iron bedsteads, mattresses, mattress covers, pillows, clothing boxes, and other articles, for 500 noncommissioned officers, musicians, and privates, to be enlisted in accordance with the provisions of section 1596, Revised Statutes, $3,000, to be immediately available.

Mr. HALE. Let this amendment go over with the others. It should be passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be passed over.

Mr. HALE. This brings us to the provision as to "Increase of the Navy." As there will be amendments offered to this clause, in order nominally to complete the reading of the bill, I suggest that we pass over the bill from line 16, on page 50, to line 9, on page 53, "armor and armament." I think there is nothing after that which need be passed over.

Mr. GORMAN. I suggest to the Senator that the clause as to armor and armament had better go over with the matter of the increase of the Navy, because it will be necessary to amend it if the Senate decides to reduce the number of ships to be authorized by the proposed act. There will not be required so much for armor for a less number of vessels.

Mr. HALE. Very well; it can go over with the other items.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be passed over.

The reading of the bill was resumed at line 22, page 53. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 53, after line 24, to insert:

The Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized and directed to cause one of the six light-draft composite gunboats authorized by the act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, and for other purposes, approved March 2, 1895, to be built and finished for a training ship for the use of the United States Naval Academy at Annapolis, Md.; and such changes in said vessel as may be necessary for its adaptation as such training ship shall be made thereto.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was concluded.

Mr. HALE. As the nominal reading of the bill has been completed, I move an amendment. On page 2, line 7, after the word "enlist," I move to insert the words "at any time after the passage of this act"; so that the enlistment of those men can go on at the present time in order to meet the needs of the new ships.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] gave notice of an amendment.

Mr. QUAY. On page 7, line 20, before the word "thousand," I move to strike out "two hundred and fifty" and insert "four hundred"; so as to read:

Reserve guns for auxiliary cruisers: Toward the armament of modern guns for auxiliary cruisers mentioned in the act approved March 3, 1891, and in section 4 of the act approved May 10, 1892, $400,000.

That is still $100,000 less than the estimate of the Bureau of Ordnance.

Mr. GORMAN. Of course this is one of the items in the bill which the Senate ought to consider. It is a new estimate. There is contained in the bill as it comes from the other House for reserve supply of projectiles an appropriation of $200,000, which is new; for additional supply of torpedoes, $142,000, which is also new; an appropriation of $250,000 for reserve guns for the auxiliary cruisers, and we also have an appropriation in the same bill of $250,000 for the auxiliary supply of guns for ships of the Navy. That makes seven or eight hundred thousand dollars for the reserve guns. These provisions, taken together with the other provisions of the bill, which must be considered, for a large increase in the Navy, make it a very extraordinary bill indeed.

The total amount of the bill as it comes from the other House is $31,047,339.95; that is money actually appropriated. The contracts that are authorized, which will require appropriations, swell that amount some $16,000,000. While I am in favor and have always been in favor of proper increase in the Navy, I suggest that in the present condition of our finances, in the present condition of our wants, we ought not to proceed so rapidly as is proposed by the pending bill. Notwithstanding the Department claim that they have facilities at the Washington Navy-Yard to manufacture these guns within a reasonable time and in time to equip the ships that have heretofore been authorized and those that are to be authorized by this bill, I do not believe that it is wise to go to this extent at the present time.

This is all I desire to say upon the pending item. When we reach the other and more important matter I shall have more to say about it.

Mr. CHANDLER. I hope the Senator from Maryland will not object to this particular amendment, but will confine any efforts he may make to limit naval expenditures to other portions of the bill. The Senator will remember that more than a year ago the estimate of the amount needed for the armament for the auxiliary cruisers was $500,000, and there was quite an earnest debate at that time because no amount was appropriated for the armament for the additional cruisers.

Mr. President, it appears that we have the right to take at any moment the New York, the Paris, the St. Louis, and the St. Paul, the great passenger steamers constituting the American Line, two of them built abroad, two of them built in this country, and they are among the fleetest ships in the world. They are, I may say, taken together, perhaps the four best ships in the world belonging to any one steamship line. The United States can take them to-morrow, and if it has the armament ready to put upon them, it can send them out upon the ocean and they can move faster than any other ships in the world. They can destroy any other commercial ship that is afloat.

Here are ships representing perhaps ten millions of money, not one dollar of which has been expended by the United States and every dollar of which has been paid by private parties, by private enterprise. We can stop the voyages of those ships, take the vessels to-morrow, convert them into fleet naval vessels, and send them out upon the ocean, if we only have the guns to put upon the ships. We have not a gun to put upon the ships and we have not begun the work of making the guns to put upon them. By expending a half million dollars we can secure as an addition to our Navy $10,500,000 worth of naval material. It is like buying guns for men. The men cost nothing until you call them into the service. When you call them into the service in an emergency, if you have not guns they are of no use to you. In my judgment there is no expenditure to be made immediately by the United States so important as the expenditures to make these four great, fine, fleet, magnificent ships an actual part of the Navy of the United States, by providing the guns which could be put upon them at an hour's notice.

There are 29 ships of the auxiliary navy, which, as the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] will state, we have the right to take at any moment; but I confine myself entirely to these four fleet ships, the armament for which I desire to see prepared as soon as possible. The British Government and other governments provide guns for their auxiliary navy, for the commercial vessels which they have the right to take at any time. They provide the guns and those guns are upon the docks or the wharves of those nations and can be made ready at a moment's notice to be placed upon the ships.

We can not excuse ourselves for neglecting longer to provide the guns for these vessels. The Senator from Maryland a year ago said that if it was necessary to use these great ships we could take other guns which the Navy Department was engaged in building. The answer to that was then, and the answer now is, that the Navy Department is authorized to build no guns whatever except when there is a ship which is ready, or ought to be ready, for the guns, and therefore no guns which the Navy Department is now engaged in building can be put upon the New York, the Paris, the St. Louis, or the St. Paul without holding those guns back from some naval vessel, the whole cost of which the people of the United States are paying.

In this view of the case, I ask the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN], if he wants to limit the total appropriation made by the bill, and with whom I am entirely willing to cooperate to some extent, to concede that for this expenditure of $400,000, which ought to be $500,000, we give to the Government in the shortest period of time the greatest possible naval defense which can be secured for that amount of money.

Mr. GORMAN. I recognize fully the force of the argument of the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire, who has given as much attention to the affairs of the Navy as any Senator in this body. I know his anxiety to build up the Navy. It has been so from his first connection with it. I share with him the general view that we must manufacture sufficient guns to equip the ships that we have or have the right to control.

The Senator states that in the last naval appropriation bill this item appeared and I opposed it. I opposed it then for the reason that I believed the appropriations were as great without this provision as the condition of the Treasury would warrant. I opposed it for another reason. I did not believe that the capacity of the Washington yard was equal to the appropriations we had made, but if the capacity of that yard was equal to the appropriations made for the armament of the other ships, the manufacturers of steel for the tubes and the jackets of these guns were not able to furnish them if we had made the appropriation, and therefore the appropriation would have been useless. I believed then that that was true. I believe it now. I know theoretically the capacity of this yard is greater than the number of guns they have turned out completed, and I know that since the last appropriation act was passed the manufacturers of steel have claimed that their facilities are greatly increased and they are enabled to furnish a larger amount than a year ago.

During the last fiscal year before the 1st day of July they were compelled to suspend a large number of persons employed in the Washington Navy-Yard and reduce that force. It is true that it was given out from the headquarters of the Navy Department to the newspaper press that that suspension was because of the failure of Congress to make an appropriation for these very guns. We were then about entering upon this patriotic course; we were then about to stir up a war feeling in the country, and it grew to immense proportions. But the fact was that that suspension was not the fault of Congress or the want of an appropriation, but it grew out of the fact that the manufacturers of the steel tubes and steel jackets for these guns had failed to furnish, according to their contract, the number that had been ordered. I do not know of any case where the Executive branch of the Government were so greatly at fault and so much to be condemned as they were in that particular case in trying to hold Congress responsible for the delay.

The fact is, Mr. President, all the guns have not been delivered yet. They could not have been delivered. After it was thought that serious trouble might come because of other questions south of us, this yard and the other yards were placed upon a war footing; all the guns that could be manufactured by the machinery that they have have been manufactured. Then there was no proposition as has been now recommended by the Committee on Appropriations to duplicate the facilities for manufacturing guns. That is proposed in the pending bill. There is a provision inserted that the Secretary of the Navy may contract for any portion of the guns that he sees proper. Fortunately for the country if an emergency should arise we have the Bethlehem and other works that can construct these guns equally as well as at the navy-yard. So the objection I had last year to making an appropriation that would be useless because of the want of facilities has to a great extent passed away.

But, Mr. President, as to the necessity and as to all this great haste in preparing for war, I do not share that feeling. I agree that the most important feature of the increase of the Navy now is the manufacture of guns. They could be utilized not only upon our Government vessels, but the great steamers the Senator from New Hampshire referred to, the New York, the Paris, the St. Louis, and the others of that line, could be utilized, if we were at war, as commerce destroyers. But is the emergency so great that we must appropriate now half a million dollars for that purpose? There is an item in the bill immediately preceding the one under consideration appropriating $250,000 for reserve guns, which can be used for any purpose on any vessel that we can control, and with the $250,000 as we have reported for reserve guns for auxiliary cruisers will make $500,000.

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] proposes to increase this amount of $250,000 to $400,000, which would make $800,000 upon that account, and then millions are to be given for the ordinary construction of the larger guns to go upon the war vessels. If the Treasury were in a condition I would say, "Yes; make this increased appropriation," but I submit to the Senate that it is unwise at this time to appropriate an amount so large on this account and then follow it up with the twenty-odd million dollars for war vessels.

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator from Maryland yield to me a moment?

Mr. GORMAN. With great pleasure.

Mr. STEWART. What is the condition of the Treasury to-day?

Mr. GORMAN. I trust to get to that a little later in the day, or to-morrow, when we reach the main item of the bill.

Mr. STEWART. We have a cash balance of $280,000,000, more than we have had for many years.

Mr. GORMAN. We have a large amount of silver also stored in the Treasury.

Mr. STEWART. Oh, no; we have too much cash balance. We are not talking about silver. We are talking about the cash balance in the Treasury, and if it is not gotten out the people will suffer, I think. I think the duty of the hour now is to make appropriations, if we have anything to appropriate for.

Mr. GORMAN. When we come to the main item of the bill I suppose the discussion will be more general, and I propose to submit some remarks then in reply to the suggestion made by my distinguished friend from Nevada; but in this matter I say to the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] and the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] that it will be wiser to go on as we have gone on in the past and make fair provision for all these items, as we have done, without the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania, which would swell the appropriation for this item to $400,000. Two hundred and fifty thousand dollars ought to be sufficient for the current year. I trust the Senator will not press his amendment, and I trust that later on both the Senator from New Hampshire and the Senator from Pennsylvania will unite with me in reducing the aggregate amount proposed to be appropriated for the increase of the Navy.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, I think there is no appropriation in the bill that is worth so much in an increase of our force at sea as this simple provision here. It goes to procure the necessary guns for the Paris, the New York, and the other two new vessels of that class and hold the guns in store ready for use in an emergency. While we practically own those ships now, while we have a right to take them at any moment, while they are a part of our Navy, they are, of course, absolutely useless for fighting. The proposed armament for the Paris and the New York and the two sister ships is five 6-inch guns each. The 6-inch projectile weighs 100 pounds, so each vessel would be able to throw 500 pounds of steel at a discharge. One of those vessels would whip, I think, about the best naval vessel that existed before the war of the rebellion. That 100-pound steel projectile is a fearful missile when sent with the velocity given it now with the improved powder. Those guns should be kept in store conveniently near. They could be put on board in a single night. The vessels are adapted to them; the frames are strengthened; the decks are strengthened. The traverse plates for the gun carriages are to be seen on the deck by any passenger. An examination below would disclose the strengthened frames. Trundle the guns on board with the ammunition, and you would have on the four ships twenty 6-inch guns, throwing an aggregate weight of 2,000 pounds.

Mr. HALE. Right in the line of the Senator's remarks, the improvements in modern machinery, as the Senator knows, make the rapid fire now apply to the 6-inch gun.

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. HALE. Heretofore it has only been applied to the 4 inch, but the contractors now are able to furnish rapid-fire 6-inch guns, as they have heretofore by contract furnished 4-inch guns. That I may say, by the way, is the reason for the provision put on at the close of the paragraph authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to contract. They are an auxiliary gun. The 6-inch rapid-fire gun, as the Senator says, makes one of these cruisers one of the most destructive types in the whole naval construction in the world.

Mr. HAWLEY. The devices for rapid firing and the extraordinary improvement in powder make the 6-inch gun or 5 or 4 inch gun probably worth twice as much as it would have been worth five years ago.

Mr. GRAY. I ask the Senator from Connecticut if those guns are available for coast defenses.

Mr. HAWLEY. They could be placed in coast defenses.

Mr. GRAY. In earthworks?

Mr. HAWLEY. Certainly; they are just as capable on shore as on board ship. The same carriages would not be furnished if the guns were intended for work on shore, that is all.

Mr. GRAY. So I supposed.

Mr. HAWLEY. If these 20 guns were in the harbor of New York and it became necessary to trundle them down to Sandy Hook or Fort Hamilton, of course that could be done, and there they could be used just as well as anywhere else. I say there is no wiser expenditure in the whole bill for the money in it than this one.

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President, I do not know that I can add anything to what has been said by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] and the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] in reply to the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN]. Of course, the Senator from Maryland and every Senator will recognize the truth of the old adage, "In time of peace prepare for war." It is no argument that the Senator from Maryland should say that there seems to be no instant occasion for the use of these guns. There has been a time within a very few days, or a very few weeks at least, when there might have been imminent necessity for the employment of these cruisers, but under the policy of the Senator from Maryland in the last Congress they would have been found absolutely worthless. He made a mistake and his party made a mistake I thought then, and I trust that the Senate will not permit them to do it now.

There are in the Navy of the United States some 75 to 100 vessels which, if the armament is ready, can be made, in the event of war, almost immediately available. There are 29 larger vessels of which we have the right to take possession. Concerning them, in their report the Bureau of Ordnance say:

Five hundred thousand dollars will be required for the manufacture of seventy 4, 5, and 6 inch guns for arming in part the auxiliary cruisers.

Two hundred and fifty guns will be required to place them in absolute equipment; so that from $3,000,000 to $2,500,000 is absolutely required to place us in condition to utilize our means of troubling an enemy on the high seas.

The Government is now entirely without means of furnishing these ships with guns or ordnance equipped of any kind. Twenty-nine of these ships which have been selected as suitable for cruisers in time of war would form a most important adjunct to our naval force if they were properly equipped. Aside from these vessels, a considerable number of excellent steamers are to be found upon the Lakes, where they would, if properly equipped, constitute the best defense of these shores in time of need. It would be wise to keep the gun shops working to their full capacity for several years in order to provide guns for such purpose. The old smoothbore guns of which a large number have accumulated during many years, are now practically obsolete, and an ample supply of modern guns should be manufactured, in order that in a crisis we should not be compelled to use such inferior weapons as the old smoothbore guns.

The British Government appreciates the situation, Mr. President. Here is what they are doing, and here is what this Government should be doing. I quote from the Naval and Military Record, published at Portsmouth, in England, April 4, 1896. It says:

The admiralty will pay in subsidies this year to the Cunard, Peninsular, and Oriental, White Star Line, and Canadian Pacific Steamship companies the sum of £48,630, an increase of £3,137 on the amount paid during the last twelve months. The vessels, with the amount of subsidy for each, are as follows:

Cunard Company, Campania and Lucania, £7,500 each; White Star Line, Teutonic, £7,385, Majestic, £7,306; Peninsular and Oriental Company, Himalaya and Australia, £3,375 each, Victoria and Arcadia, £2,433 each; Canadian Pacific Company, Empress of India, Empress of China, and Empress of Japan, £2,437 each. In addition to this, the companies engage to hold the following steamships at the disposition of the admiralty without further subsidy: White Star Line, Britannic, Germanic, and Adriatic; Cunard Company, Etruria, Umbria, Aurania, and Servia; Peninsular and Oriental Company, Britannia, Oceana, Peninsular, Oriental, Valetta, Masilia, Rome, Carthage, Ballarat and Parramatta.

Now, Mr. President, I quote further, and invite the attention of the Senate to the quotation:

A reserve stock of breech-loading of the latter types of machine guns, with the necessary mountings and fittings, has recently been supplied in lieu of muzzle-loading guns for the ready armament of these vessels in the event of their being required. As a precaution against delay, a merchant cruiser reserve depot has been established on each station at which the vessels call, so that a merchant ship could be converted into a war vessel within a very short time; in fact, within a few hours if she happened to be at one of the naval depot ports.

My intention in offering the amendment is merely to put the Government in a way of beginning what the British Government has already accomplished with a view to meeting us on the seas.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PERKINS. I desire to offer an amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from California will suspend. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be read by title.

The SECRETARY. A resolution, by Mr. PEPPER, providing for a committee of five Senators to investigate and report generally all the material facts and circumstances connected with the sale of United States bonds by the Secretary of the Treasury in the years 1894, 1895, and 1896.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside, without losing its place on the Calendar, until the present appropriation bill is disposed of.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The amendment of the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS] will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Amend by adding, on page 6, after line 8:

Naval training station on the island of Yerba Buena (or Goat Island), in the harbor of San Francisco, Cal., for apprentices: For the construction of buildings and other improvements, $100,000.

Mr. GORMAN. I do not see the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] present, but I shall be compelled to raise a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. PERKINS. On what grounds does the Senator from Maryland make a point of order?

Mr. GORMAN. It is new legislation, and is not estimated for.

Mr. PERKINS. Early in December I introduced a bill providing for this training station. It duly passed the Senate. It passed the House of Representatives, and on the 24th of April the President affixed his signature to the bill establishing the training station. Therefore we are simply proposing by the amendment to carry out the law and establish the station. I fail to see how the point of order can lie.

Mr. GORMAN. Does the Senator state that the act has passed both Houses and is a law?

Mr. PERKINS. It passed both Houses, and it was approved by the President April 24. I verified it in the office of the Secretary of the Senate a few minutes since.

Mr. GORMAN. What is the provision of the act? I have not had my attention called to it.

Mr. PERKINS. The Senator from Maryland voted for it. I will have it read if he desires. I will state that in substance it established a training station for apprentices upon Yerba Buena Island, in the harbor of San Francisco. Mr. President, I wish to state that the object of the act and of the pending amendment is to Americanize the Navy. On the Pacific Coast we have no place where an apprentice boy can be enlisted into the Navy.

We have at Newport a naval training station. We have two training ships to take the boys who are apprentices at that station upon cruises on the Atlantic, the Gulf of Mexico, and elsewhere, and we are training boys to become seamen and Americanize our Navy and man an American navy.

On the Pacific Coast, extending from Lower California to Alaska, with over 4,000 miles of coast, with more than 25,000 miles, following the indentation of the shore, we have no place where boys can be enlisted in the Navy. Five or six times during the past year, as a special concession from the Navy Department, I have had permission to have boys there, and they are doing well. We have hundreds and hundreds of American boys who are seeking to gain admission into the Navy.

The object of the amendment is to establish a station for that purpose. I do not mean to say, as the Senator from Maryland may say, that we are going to make sailors on land; but when you take a boy of 14 or 15 years of age, modest, ignorant of the ways of the world, without discipline, without drill, it requires time to fit him to go on a cruising ship at sea. Therefore he is to be sent to the station, where he is probably disciplined in morals, in cleanliness, and all that goes to make a proper boy, and after six months' or a year's time he is detailed on a sailing vessel and sent off to sea, and in due time he will become an American seaman.

We have no merchant service whereby we can recruit our seamen from that service, as was the case in the earlier history of our country. I was deeply impressed in reading the report a few days since of the course pursued by the English navy. No matter what we may think of them, they speak our language, in a measure they are our own people, and they frequently get lessons that we may profit by. One of these lessons especially is that their ships are manned by English subjects. I do not believe that outside of the culinary department of the English navy you will find one-quarter of 1 per cent who are not English subjects. The English seaman feels a pride in his country's navy and the ship that is his home. He is a patriot and ready to fight for St. George's cross. I was impressed with the plan they have adopted which gives them that English patriotism, which makes their ships and their sailors the pride of their country.

In the naval estimates for the year ending March 31, 1897, out of the total number of officers and men for Her Majesty's fleet of 65,757, of which 56,420 are petty officers and seamen, there are 4,495 boys, and out of a total for other services of 7,932 there were 5,300 boys under training, which gives their navy a total of 9,795 boys assigned to seagoing ships or at a training station. So about 16 per cent, I think, of their navy are boys.

We have 9,250 seamen, I think, under the present law, and 750 boys. So we have only about 8 per cent of boys, one-half the number allowed by England.

Allow me, Mr. President, to ask where are the Decatur of 1781 to come from? Where are the Perrys to come from, who said in glowing language, "We have met the enemy and they are ours"? Where are those who fought in 1812 and shed luster and glory upon the glorious Stars and Stripes to come from in future if it is not the American boys to whom we shall look? I say it is short-sighted policy on the part of Congress that they have not taken a greater interest in building up our Navy by encouraging American boys to enlist in the service of the Navy. We are proud of our new Navy. Our ships are built by American mechanics; they are the product of American workmen. Now, let us have it manned by Americans, and let every home be represented by some relative of that home in the Navy.

In looking over the report of the enlistment last year for the months of July, August, September, and October I find that a majority of all the seamen enlisted in our Navy were foreigners. Can we sit idly by and permit this to go on when by a mere pittance we can establish training stations where we will give our boys an elementary education, discipline them, drill them in good morals, in cleanliness, and teach them that the greatest gift that can be given to anyone is to be an American citizen? No one feels more patriotism, and there is no one who stands ready to hold up the dignity and honor of our flag and our country more than does the American seaman. We have not encouraged American seamen heretofore, but we have now commenced and the Department are in sympathy with us. I hope the amendment which I have offered will be adopted.

Mr. GORMAN. As to the suggestion of the Senator from California that a bill has recently been passed to establish a training school on the Pacific Coast, I have the act to which the Senator refers, which reads as follows:

That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized to establish a training station for naval apprentices on the island of Yerba Buena (or Goat Island), in the harbor of San Francisco, Cal.; and said Secretary is authorized to designate two officers of the Navy, and the Secretary of War is authorized to designate one officer of the Army, said three officers to constitute a board, who shall select and assign so much of said island as may be necessary for the purpose of establishing said naval training station; and the site so selected, when approved by the President, shall be, by virtue of this act, transferred to the Navy Department for the purposes of said naval training station.

SEC. 2. That all apprentices of the Navy, whether at a training station, or on board an apprentice training ship, shall be additional to the number of enlisted persons allowed by law for the Navy.

It is true that this act may have been recently approved by the President, and I take it for granted that it has been, but we have no official knowledge of that fact, and I make the point that no estimate has been made for an appropriation such as is contemplated by the amendment of the Senator from California and that his amendment is not in order on this bill.

Mr. PERKINS. With the permission of the Senator from Maryland, I ask to have read for his information a letter from the Chief of Bureau of Yards and Docks.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The letter will be read, in the absence of objection.

The Secretary read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 30, 1896.

MY DEAR SENATOR: After consultation with Admiral Ramsay, who has charge of the personnel, I would respectfully submit the following estimates for the necessary buildings to be erected on Yerba Buena Island to fit it for a naval apprentice station:

Building for apprentices.....	$67,000
Quarters for commandant.....	12,000
Quarters for two officers.....	12,000
Office and storehouse.....	3,000
Hospital building.....	5,000
Total.....	100,000

I believe there is a wharf already at the island.

I have the honor to remain, your obedient servant,

E. O. MATTHEWS,

Chief of Bureau Yards and Docks.

Hon. GEORGE C. PERKINS,
United States Senate.

Mr. GORMAN. The Senator will see that that is not an estimate. There is no estimate here for this appropriation, and the ink on the pen with which the bill which recently passed was signed, if it has been signed, is scarcely dry. No action whatever has been taken by the Navy Department looking to the establishment of such a training station, and, of course, no estimate can come in at the present time. What the Senator has presented is merely a letter from the chief of one of the Department bureaus.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask the Senator from Maryland would not the amendment be in order to carry out a law already passed? We passed a bill through both Houses, which has gone to the President, and which the Senator has read, which authorizes the establishment of a training station on the Pacific Coast. Now, is it not in order to move to give the Secretary of the Navy some sum of money to enable him to carry out the provisions of that act under the clause of our rules, with which the Senator is very familiar, that an amendment making an appropriation may be in order to carry out a previous order or decision of the Senate at the same session. This is not merely a decision of the Senate, but of Congress.

Mr. GORMAN. I think clearly not. The paper which the Senator from California has had read is a mere letter from the chief of one of the bureaus in the Navy Department, and I do not think it will cover the case.

Mr. CHANDLER. I should like to have the rule read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the first clause of Rule XVI.

The Secretary read as follows:

1. All general appropriation bills shall be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, except bills making appropriations for rivers and harbors, which shall be referred to the Committee on Commerce; and no amendments shall be received to any general appropriation bill, the effect of which will be to increase an appropriation already contained in the bill, or to add a new item of appropriation, unless it be made to carry out the provisions of some existing law, or treaty stipulation, or act, or resolution previously passed by the Senate during that session; or unless the same be moved by direction of a standing or select committee of the Senate or proposed in pursuance of an estimate of the head of some one of the Departments.

Mr. PERKINS. I am willing to submit the amendment on that rule.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair overrules the point of order under the statement made by the Senator from California. The question is on the amendment. [Putting the question.] The ayes appear to have it.

Mr. GORMAN. Let us have the yeas and nays, Mr. President. The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, I know the anxiety of the distinguished Senator from California and his colleagues from the Pacific Coast to secure for that section of the country liberal appropriations. I have myself always believed that we must give every possible encouragement to the people on the Pacific Coast to build their vessels and to create great manufacturing establishments which will be necessary in the future. I think their industry and their influence with this Congress and with past Congresses in securing appropriations will stand for all time as a monument to show what Senators may accomplish by persistent action.

We have provided for the Pacific Coast most liberally by this bill. I have been anxious to see the great navy-yard at Mare Island made one of the first shipbuilding yards in the country. It is established at a point which is absolutely necessary not only for war purposes, but with a view of building up a great commercial marine. For that navy-yard we have most liberally provided. Ships to be used by the Treasury Department in the enforcement of the revenue laws we have given the Pacific Coast without stint.

We make special provision to increase the cost of all these structures on the Pacific Coast because it seems to be necessary. We have given dry docks at San Francisco and upon Puget Sound. We are appealed to, Mr. President, and with justice, to increase the appropriations on account of those dry docks, so that we may have places for our great ships to enter and to be repaired. We have great pressure also coming from the Gulf, and we have it from the Atlantic Coast; but the Committee on Appropriations, which is most liberal—too liberal, in my judgment, considering the present condition of affairs—has been compelled to deny these requests from other sections of the country; but I say to the Senators from California, while I have been the consistent friend of the projects they have had on hand, because I believed they were necessary and in the best interests of the country, this amendment ought not to be now pressed.

The Chair has decided the amendment to be in order—I will not take an appeal from the decision of the Chair—simply because of a bill which is said to have passed both Houses and to have become a law, but of which, so far as I know, there is no official notice; and this amendment is pressed in this body without ever having been sent to the Committee on Appropriations and without an estimate from any head of a Department, making provision for buildings and for the maintenance of this institution when the ground has not been laid off and when no officer of the Government has yet ascertained what ought to be done.

Mr. FAULKNER. And there is no limitation upon the cost.

Mr. GORMAN. Yes, Mr. President, that is true, as the Senator from West Virginia suggests, and yet we are to be pressed here to appropriate sixty or seventy thousand dollars to begin an enterprise which, so far as we know officially, may cost a million or five million dollars in the end.

The Pacific Coast has been treated with more generosity than any other section of this country in appropriations as they are found in this bill, and if the Senators from that coast press the amendment, let the Senate determine it. I appeal to the Senator from California not to press the amendment, because from the beginning of my service here I have been more than liberal to every enterprise which has been projected upon that coast, but this is going beyond anything that has occurred in legislation of which I have knowledge. It is pressing a great matter without an estimate and without its having been referred to the proper committee for consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The decision of the Chair was based upon the legislation indicated by the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS]. The Senate has been officially notified of the approval by the President of the act referred to, the Chair will state in justification of the decision which he has rendered.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, I want, on behalf of the delegation from California, to say to the distinguished Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] that we fully appreciate his kindness in what he has done in years past in assisting us to bring before the country the great undeveloped interests of our State and of the Pacific Coast generally. That is a part of our great country, it is a part of the Senator's country, and he would be less a patriot, less an American citizen, than I know him to be if he had not assisted in fostering and building up for the good of our country the great shipbuilding yards on the Pacific Coast and assisting in the construction of the dry docks and improvements of the navy-yard in California, which do not belong to that State alone, but belong as much to Maryland, which the Senator represents with so much ability.

We have agreed on every proposition relating to the building up of the Navy. We admit what the Senator has done for California; but he seems to have come to the crossroads near the close of his remarks. He said he believed in building ships on the Pacific Coast. So do we; and we believe in manning them on the Pacific Coast—manning them with Americans. We wish to man them with Americans because we want to Americanize our Navy. But in order to do that we must take apprentices, and we must teach them the art of seamanship; we must teach them those intricate things connected with a man-of-war, with a vessel which plies upon the ocean, and which it is necessary for them to know if they are to become efficient in that profession, for it is a profession, a trade, which no one can acquire except by application and by experience. All we ask of you to do is to do that which the Secretary of the Navy has recommended, that the heads of the different bureaus of the Department have recommended; that is, to assist us in the construction and establishment on that great Pacific empire of the West, the great Pacific coast of California, a station similar to that which you have at Newport.

When the Senator appeals to my colleague and myself, as he has done, asking us to withdraw this amendment, I fear if I did so I should be unjust to the thousands of boys on that coast who are waiting anxiously the time when they may be admitted as apprentices into the naval schools of our country. I would be unjust to those people who are writing me by every mail saying, "Press that bill. We have hundreds of boys here who are driven out of employment by reason of Japanese and Chinese competition, and we want to send them into the Navy and help Americanize it."

But I will, with the consent of my colleague, instead of $100,000, make the amendment $50,000, and we will raise the balance of the money among the liberal-minded people of California, if it be necessary, to complete the work.

Mr. PEPPER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question before he takes his seat?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

Mr. PEPPER. I understood from the Senator's remarks that he is limiting admission to this naval school to the boys of California. Is that correct?

Mr. PERKINS. No, sir. No such provision is in the amendment. They may come from any State in the Union. We are not exclusive in California.

Mr. PEPPER. I thought not.

Mr. PERKINS. Any boys in Kansas whose friends will pay their passage we will admit to the school and make good sailors of.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, during my four years of service on the Naval Committee in the House of Representatives I had occasion to look into the results of the training school established at Newport, and I think anyone who has examined the workings of the apprentice system and its results must be satisfied that no measure has ever been passed by Congress which has been more beneficial to the character of the American Navy than that. At the time when this apprentice school was established the seamen on American ships of war had become very largely persons of foreign birth, and it was to get rid of that undoubted evil that the apprentice system was established and the training school with a training ship was formed.

I do not regard the proposition of the Senator from California as in the least a local matter; it is one which affects the character of the American Navy. As we have two great ocean coasts, where it is obviously necessary and will be necessary for us to maintain two independent fleets, it seems to me of the utmost importance that we should have a training school, not so large, perhaps, as the one at Newport, but of a similar character, to provide apprentices for the ships on the Pacific Coast. There have been times, as the matter now stands, when it has been found necessary to ship an entire crew across the continent in order to man the ships on that coast.

Mr. PERKINS. That is so now.

Mr. LODGE. If we establish a training school at San Francisco and furnish it, as it will be furnished, with a training ship, we shall be able in a very short time to largely supply vessels on the Pacific Coast with men drawn from the training school. It will increase, as the Newport school has increased, the percentage of native American seamen; it will improve the character of the service, and I think it can not fail to be a benefit to the whole Navy.

I hope, therefore, that the amendment as proposed by the Senator from California will be adopted, for it is simply designed to carry out the wise general policy which has been already established by Congress with the training school and training ship at Newport.

Mr. WILSON. I should like to have the amendment again read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment submitted by the Senator from California as modified will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out the words "one hundred" where they appear in the amendment and insert "fifty"; so as to make the amendment read:

Naval training station on the island of Yerba Buena (or Goat Island), in the harbor of San Francisco, Cal. (for apprentices): For the construction of buildings and other improvements, $50,000.

Mr. PLATT. Where is that amendment to be inserted?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. After line 8, on page 6.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, there ought to be some limitation to the building of houses or the erection of other buildings in connection with this or any other naval training school. The whole purpose originally of the training school was to put boys on shipboard, on training ships, and train them there. The tendency is to abandon the training ship and to go on shore and get quarters, thereby subverting the original intention of the training school. This is the tendency to-day at Newport; and the committee has all the time to stand in the way of propositions to abandon the original design of these schools. I should not vote for this amendment unless there were some limitation which would prevent this very thing happening, which destroys the purpose of any training school for the Navy.

Some years ago Congress dedicated the Hartford to the service of the training school whenever it should be established. Congress has appropriated most generously in that direction for fitting up that ship, and there ought not now to be any great project started which will result in a large expenditure for buildings on shore, and thereby take away the uses for which the Hartford was dedicated by Congress. Unless there is some limitation of that kind added to the amendment I certainly should not vote in favor of it.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, I have no objection to the Senator making a limitation as to the amount which is to be expended on shore; but no one understands better than he does—for he is from the coast of Maine—that it is impossible, or at least it is inexpedient, to house, say, 500 boys on board of a small ship for twelve months in the year. Perhaps the Senator forgets when he was a boy and liked to play baseball. But boys should have the opportunity of going on shore at times, and there be disciplined in shore life as well as on shipboard. At Newport, I am informed, there are frequently 300 or 400 boys on shore. The Department, however, endeavors to so provide as not to have more than 200 at a time; to have relays, as it were. So it should be with us on the Pacific Coast. We expect to have 500 boys there attached to the training school, one-half of whom will be at sea all the time; and perhaps the Adams or some other wooden ship might be used for the purpose. I think the boys should be disciplined on a sailing ship to learn seamanship, for a large number of them will be at sea all the time on that coast.

I am willing to accept any reasonable amendment. I have no object in view, Mr. President, except as I have stated—that which Congress has evinced its willingness to attain by the law to which I have referred—the establishment of an apprentice school where boys may enter, not because they trace their genealogy to some Senator or some member of the House of Representatives who gets them an appointment at the Naval Academy, but where boys who are physically and mentally able to pass an examination may enter and receive a training which will make them the pride of our American Navy. Officers are all very well in their way, but it was Lord Nelson who won the great naval battle, who ran up at the masthead the inspiring words which have come down through time, "England expects every man to do his duty." We all know how well every man did his duty on that great naval occasion. So with us, we want our American boys to do their duty, but they can not do it unless we give them an opportunity of doing it.

To-day, as has been stated by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], it is necessary to transport sailors from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean to man our ships. We are paying for the transportation of boys from the Atlantic to the Pacific when we have thousands of boys in the States of Washington, Oregon, and California who are waiting anxiously to enter the Government service. This amendment only provides an opportunity for them to do so; and for the life of me I can not understand how any patriotic American can object to so mild a measure as this. It is in the interest of our Navy; it is in the interest of American boys; it is in the interest of our country.

I have modified the amendment on the suggestion of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN], and I hope it will now be adopted by a viva voce vote, and without objection.

Mr. FAULKNER. Mr. President, the sentiment of Congress has been fully expressed in favor of this project by the passage of the bill which has already been passed, and which the President has approved, but that bill looks forward to the transaction from that period being conducted in a businesslike way. The law provides that the Secretary of the Navy shall formulate plans for the establishment of that school, for the erection of the buildings necessary at that point, and to submit a report to Congress for its approval. By the adoption of the proposition of the Senator from California at this time, without any estimate whatever from the Department, without any plan laid out by the Department as to the extent of the buildings which it will be necessary to erect, it is proposed that we shall appropriate a lump sum of $50,000, and say, "Go ahead, lay out your plans; expend the $50,000, and subsequently make your report to Congress; and if it is not approved we will tear down the buildings, throw away the $50,000 and make a new appropriation."

Now, I submit to the honorable Senator from California that to go into this business the proper way would be to wait until suitable plans have been formulated by the Department. When those plans have been formulated, Congress is committed by the act which has already been passed to make appropriations for the erection of those buildings, if the plans are in accordance with the judgment of Congress as to that particular training school.

Mr. President, we can not even pass a bill for the erection of a court-house for use of the Government without a limitation upon the Department in the expenditure of the money for that purpose; and yet here in this amendment there is no limitation whatever. The plan designed by the Department may involve thousands and thousands of dollars over and above what Congress would be willing to appropriate for this particular purpose, and the expenditure of $50,000 might be absolutely thrown away and wasted by Congress not approving of the designs which may be subsequently adopted.

For these reasons, and these alone, I shall feel compelled to vote against the amendment of the honorable Senator from California.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the Senator from California has asked me to formulate an amendment which would restrain the erection of unnecessary buildings in connection with this institution. I can not do that. The Secretary of the Navy is the man to do that.

The trouble is that the Senator from California is too fast in asking for an appropriation now. He has got his bill through providing for this training school, and the Secretary of the Navy will report a plan at the next session of Congress, and then we shall be able to act intelligently.

I may say—the Senator will recall it—when he first spoke to me about this proposed amendment I said, "You should be content with the passage of the act, and at the next session of Congress the Secretary will come in with his plans and make limitations, which Congress will consider." I can not make them now, because I do not know what the limitations should be. In the meantime, the distinctive work that is valuable for this coming training school, the building and the restoring of the Hartford and making her a training ship, is going on, but she can take no boys between now and next December, and there is no ship which can take one of these boys between now and next December.

I understand the Senator, who is very earnest and very able in his advocacy of the wants of his section of the country, would like to get this thing done now, but it seems to me I am justified in saying to him that he is premature in asking the Senate now to appropriate this money, when the whole scheme of the law which he has got through, and which we all helped him to get through, provides that it shall be considered by the Secretary of the Navy and a report made to Congress. If this amendment be adopted there will not be a single boy from the Senator's State who will get into the training school anywhere between now and next December. Therefore I hope the Senator will feel that he has accomplished his great work in getting Congress to establish this training school and leave the appropriation of money to come in subsequently, when an estimate has been made, a plan submitted, and the whole scheme laid before Congress. That is why I feel constrained to vote against the appropriation.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, one word more and I am done. I seldom in a contest surrender until I am defeated, but when I see my associates on the committee so inconsistent as they have been in their declarations in this case, that there should be a limit upon every appropriation made, I must admit it is discouraging.

We have gone through this bill, and there is not an appropriation made under the Bureau of Navigation, under the Bureau of Ordnance, or under the Bureau of Equipment, which is limited, or in which there is a provision that a specific work shall cost no more than the amount named; and my short experience here has led me to believe that many deficiency bills have come in where there was a limit prescribed.

One word in answer to my friend from West Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER], that there has been no estimate for this appropriation. We have the same estimate that we have for other purposes. It has been read from the desk.

Mr. FAULKNER. I will state that it is not in law what we call an estimate. It is simply a statement of the head of a bureau in the Navy Department. Without examination we do not even know whether there is a dock there. He thinks there is.

Mr. PERKINS. By the advice and consent of the Secretary of the Navy the bill became a law on the 24th of the present month. This appropriation, if it passes, will not be available until after the 1st of next July. There is ample time to make the estimates, to appoint the commission, to select a site, and have the school in operation. The Hartford is a magnificent ship, a ship with a historic reputation, a credit to the Navy, and, while she will accommodate some of the young men, she is not suitable for a proper training ship. There should be a vessel like the Adams or some other smaller vessel. We have in this bill several propositions, one affecting especially the building of battle ships upon the Pacific Coast. As I stated before, my friend the Senator from Maryland has always been kind to us in California. He has made an appeal to me to withdraw the amendment. I propose to do so, with the permission of the Senate, and let the matter rest until next December.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. CHANDLER. I offer an amendment by direction of the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, after line 23, it is proposed to insert:

And provided further, That no payment shall be made from the appropriations in this bill to any officer in the Navy or Marine Corps on the active or retired list while such officer is employed, after June 30, 1897, by any person or company furnishing naval supplies or war material to the Government; and such employment is hereby made unlawful after said date.

Mr. GORMAN. I should like to have some explanation of the amendment. Will the Senator from New Hampshire kindly give the Senate the reason for the amendment?

Mr. CHANDLER. The Committee on Naval Affairs have been investigating the subject of contracts for battle ships and armor, and their attention has been called to what they consider an unwelcome practice in connection with the naval service.

Naval officers upon the retired list draw ordinarily three-quarters of the full pay of a naval officer. They are not subject to be ordered to duty except in time of war. They have been in the habit, when their ailments or infirmities or disabilities which placed them upon the retired list have not wholly incapacitated them for duty, of entering into private employment. When that private employment is with business concerns that do not do business with the Government, no objection is perceived to such action. A retired naval officer—and he may be comparatively a young man—can draw his pay from the Government and also work for private individuals or corporations, and, as I say, there is no objection to it unless his employer is doing business with the United States.

The committee were of opinion that where this permission to a retired naval officer had been used by him to enter into the employment of large contractors with the Government, as, for instance, the contractors to furnish armor to the United States—contractors having large contracts running up into the millions of dollars—it is objectionable. It is objectionable, we think, to have a naval officer drawing a large sum annually from the United States, and also drawing compensation to a large amount from contractors who do business with the Government. To put it more in the concrete, it is objectionable to have retired officers of the Navy, drawing their salaries as retired officers, enter into the employment of contractors who are doing business on a large scale with the Navy Department.

Mr. HALE. Let me suggest to the Senator one point which he may have brought out, as my attention was diverted. The amendment does not interfere at all with the employment of a naval officer who is not needed for the uses of the Navy by any private concern that has nothing to do with the Government. It does not touch that at all.

Mr. CHANDLER. I had just reached that point, I will say to the Senator from Maine. I have stated the objection. Why is it objectionable? A retired officer of the Navy or Army is on the list. He comes to Washington. He is received with open arms at the War Department or at the Navy Department. He has facilities for learning what is going on in either of the two Departments. It is not desirable that he should be treated otherwise when he comes to the Department to which he belongs. But is it not a great mistake to allow that naval officer, with all the knowledge that he has, with all the facilities he has, with all the opportunities he has in connection with the Department, to enter into the service of these contractors who are thus doing business with the United States? He can enter into any private employment he pleases when the persons who employ him are not in the business of furnishing naval supplies or making contracts with the Government. Without imputing any censure as to any past transaction, the committee reached the conclusion that here is a practice which ought to end.

The Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] will notice that this employment is not prohibited until a year from the 30th of June next, so that any naval officers now so employed will have plenty of time in which to arrange to enter into other business, if it be necessary that they should enter into other business for their subsistence. I purposely avoid—

Mr. GRAY. At what point does the amendment come in? I have just entered the Chamber.

Mr. CHANDLER. It comes in at the close of the paragraph, under the heading "Pay of the Navy."

Mr. HALE. Let the amendment be again read. Some of us were not here when it was first read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will again be stated.

The SECRETARY. After line 23, page 2, it is proposed to insert:
And provided further, That no payment shall be made from the appropriations in this bill to any officer in the Navy or Marine Corps on the active or retired list while such officer is employed, after June 30, 1897, by any person or company furnishing naval supplies or war material to the Government; and such employment is hereby made unlawful after said date.

Mr. CHANDLER. I purposely refrained from citing any particular cases where I think an abuse has taken place, because these employments have been allowed by the Navy Department. I suppose they have been allowed by the War Department. But there are cases which do not reflect credit upon the naval service, and the committee think they ought to come to an end.

Mr. GRAY. May I ask the Senator from New Hampshire a question? I may ask him to repeat what he has said when I was out of the Chamber, and if so I shall be sorry. What is the real objection to a retired officer of the Navy, who has the requisite accomplishments, being employed by a concern that is making steel or guns for the Navy, if they can make his accomplishments and experience useful to themselves and to the Government?

Mr. CHANDLER. The objection is that that man is of our own household. He belongs to us. He has served us on the active list; he has gone upon the retired list; but still he is a naval officer.

Mr. GRAY. Very well.

Mr. CHANDLER. And his relations with the Navy Department are such that it is an impropriety, I think—I believe the committee were inclined to think so—while drawing a salary and remaining an officer of the Government to enter into the employment of a large corporation having great business transactions with the Navy Department.

Mr. GRAY. Take the case, if the Senator from New Hampshire will allow me—I do not know whether he has finished.

Mr. CHANDLER. I have finished.

Mr. GRAY. If I am not interrupting him, take the case of an officer of the Navy who has conceded skill in his profession, and more than ordinary accomplishment in the direction of construction and in the making of material for our guns or armor plate, and he is retired against his will, say, for color-blindness or something of that kind. Why should he be debarred, after being turned down by a board of superserviceable naval surgeons, from the profession of his life and of his choice and be put upon a pay that beggars him, and not be allowed to use the unquestioned ability and skill that he may have derived while in the service of the United States in the employment of a concern that is doing this great work for the Navy? What objection is there to it? What impropriety is there in it? He is not to be condemned to beggary because certain naval surgeons who want to exploit their own usefulness, perhaps, have discovered that he is not so efficient, physically, as they think he ought to be, whereas he is just as efficient as any officer who walks the deck of an American vessel, and have consigned him to beggary practically by putting him upon the furlough list along with drunkards and imbeciles and others who have the reproach of being retired for causes of that kind.

Mr. CHANDLER. I know the Senator from Delaware wants me to interrupt him at this point, because if he will reflect for a moment he will see that an officer retired for color-blindness does not go upon the furlough retired list.

Mr. GRAY. He does go upon that list. I beg the Senator's pardon. That is just where they have gone, to my knowledge.

Mr. HAWLEY. At $75 a month.

Mr. GRAY. At $75 a month.

Mr. CHANDLER. That, I suppose, is because his disability is treated as not having occurred in the naval service.

Mr. GRAY. Certainly it did not occur in the naval service, if there was such; and yet an officer of that kind might be as efficient to perform service at sea as any man who holds an active commission.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from Delaware seems to want to discuss the conduct of a naval board in particular cases. Would the Senator be willing to keep on the active list and send to sea a man who can not tell a green light from a red light?

Mr. GRAY. When a man has been in the Navy twenty-five years and has passed every examination, professionally and otherwise, and has acquitted himself so as to make himself one of the very best types of the American citizen, I do not think color-blindness ought to drive him from the Navy.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask the Senator the question.

Mr. GRAY. There is never a time when he is on the deck of a naval vessel to distinguish the light of another vessel that there are not others upon deck.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask the Senator the specific question whether, if a man could not tell a red light from a green light, he would retain him in active service?

Mr. GRAY. I think the country ought not to be deprived of his services in a case of that kind. I think the naval surgeons have made too much of that. It magnifies their importance, perhaps.

Mr. CHANDLER. Whether the Senator would do that or not, it is not the superserviceable surgeons of whom he speaks—

Mr. GRAY. They make the regulations.

Mr. CHANDLER. Who declare that color-blindness shall prevent a naval officer from being promoted. It is the Secretary of the Navy; it is the Department.

Mr. GRAY. Oh, the Department does it under the advice of the surgeons.

Mr. CHANDLER. Still the head of a Department is responsible for what takes place.

Mr. GRAY. The Department does it under the advice of the surgeons.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator says the officers are reduced to beggary. Now, an officer is not—

Mr. GRAY. An officer 40 years of age, or thereabouts, when he can do nothing else, is reduced to beggary when he is put upon one-quarter of his pay.

Mr. CHANDLER. Let me suggest this case to the Senator. Such an officer goes into the employ of a contractor, a corporation having large contracts with the Government. There is a controversy; there are moot questions between the contractor and the Navy Department. That officer can be sent over here, he can be sent to the Navy Department, he can be sent to ascertain facts and do business. There certainly is an incongruity in having that officer draw a very handsome salary from the United States and also be in the employ of the contractor furnishing naval supplies to the Government.

Mr. GRAY. I think not. I think the Navy is exceedingly fortunate in having such a man. All of his prejudices and prepossessions and tendencies are in favor of the Navy. You can not say that such a man would be less faithful than a man who had no connection with the Government.

Mr. CHANDLER. He is certainly serving two masters—a Government contractor and the Government, too.

Mr. GRAY. The Government has no right to complain. The contractor may have a right to complain. What right has the Government to complain if the contractors have a naval officer in their employ. He is certainly as good as a civilian who has no prejudices or prepossessions in favor of the Navy.

Mr. CHANDLER. Such an officer draws $5,000 from the contractor for naval supplies and $2,500 from us.

Mr. GRAY. There is no such case.

Mr. CHANDLER. What is that?

Mr. GRAY. There are no such cases.

Mr. CHANDLER. I think there are.

Mr. GRAY. No; there are not.

Mr. CHANDLER. There are cases very much like that. There are cases in that proportion.

Mr. GRAY. The only men who are likely to seek such employment and receive it are the younger officers who have obtained the skill, who have studied and have made themselves proficient in their professions, who are turned down from some slight physical defect such as I have described, who have to seek a living elsewhere. They are retained upon the retired list at the very lowest possible pay, furlough pay, pay that is given to men who are retired for drunkenness or incapacity or something of that kind and have to seek a living for themselves.

Now, if the officers avail themselves of the skill and experience which they have obtained while in the Navy to get employment from the people who have contracts with the Navy, certainly the Government has no right to complain, for all their prepossessions and all their prejudices, if there are any, must be in favor of the Government, whereas a civilian employee employed by such a firm would be altogether, it seems to me, in the service and for the interest of his concern.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from Delaware makes a mistake when he says that a naval officer is put on the retired list for drunkenness.

Mr. GRAY. I do not know whether there are any officers who have been retired for drunkenness, but there is a list, the retired list of the Navy—

Mr. CHANDLER. The whole retired list of the Navy is a roll of honor, and there is a very explicit law, which the Senator himself helped to frame, which provides that when a naval officer fails to secure his promotion on account of any fact arising from his own misconduct he shall not go upon the retired list. He goes out of the service.

Mr. GRAY. However that may be, I can not see where the interests of the Government are prejudiced in the slightest degree by having men whom these private concerns are anxious to employ, and whom they are anxious to employ only because they have the requisite skill and the requisite knowledge and accomplishment to accept such employment. I do not see why the Government should complain if those men are engaged by firms doing work for the Government.

Mr. CHANDLER. Because the Government is paying them a salary itself.

Mr. GRAY. It pays them a salary anyhow.

Mr. HALE. In addition to that they are in an employment that is literally antagonistic to the Government. The contractors from early morn until the end of the day are seeking constantly to get the advantage of the Government, to get enormous profits, and to deplete the Treasury of appropriations; and a naval officer commissioned by the Government, under pay, ought to be forbidden to enter into their employment at any and all times.

Mr. GRAY. Why?

Mr. HALE. It will make a scandal if he is not.

Mr. GRAY. Oh!

Mr. HALE. It is antagonistic. As the Senator from New Hampshire says, he is trying to serve two masters, and the masters are antagonistic to each other. If I were Secretary of the Navy I should never permit a naval officer to take employment in a company or with an individual engaged in contracts with the Government. I would keep him out of such employ because it is antagonistic.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire a question or two. I did not exactly catch the name of the naval officer who is engaged in this kind of work.

Mr. CHANDLER. No names have been mentioned, I will say. I have purposely refrained from mentioning names because we think this question ought to be disposed of as a matter of principle.

Mr. ALLEN. I understood the Senator to say that the Naval Affairs Committee had made an investigation and had found that several retired naval officers had been engaged in this practice, and I think I heard the Senator from New Hampshire mention the name of one.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator is mistaken.

Mr. ALLEN. Has the result of the investigation been reduced to writing and reported to the Senate?

Mr. CHANDLER. The committee have not yet finished their investigation.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to ask the Senator if it will be reduced to writing and presented to the Senate at any time.

Mr. CHANDLER. The testimony is fully printed.

Mr. HALE. The Senator will let me say that I do not think anything in the investigation disclosed any bad management or corruption on the part of those officers, but the committee was profoundly impressed with the unfortunate situation in which they found themselves, being officers of the Navy employed by a corporation that is all the time seeking for large appropriations from the Government. I think the Senator from New Hampshire will agree with me that nothing was found reflecting upon the personal character and integrity of those officers. It is their unfortunate situation.

Mr. ALLEN. No; I did not think there was anything involving moral turpitude found by the committee, but I was not certain whether or not it was the purpose of the Naval Affairs Committee to report the result of its investigation to the Senate before the adjournment of Congress. I ask the Senator from New Hampshire if that is the purpose of the committee?

Mr. CHANDLER. I will state that it is very doubtful whether the committee will make a report before the adjournment of the present session.

Mr. ALLEN. It is the purpose of the committee, however, to make a report?

Mr. CHANDLER. To make a report.

Mr. ALLEN. At some time?

Mr. CHANDLER. To make a report and to make public the testimony which has been taken.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes.

Mr. CHANDLER. The testimony, as the Senator from Maine says, makes no reflection upon any particular naval officer now in the employ of the armor contractors. But the testimony does disclose a system which the committee deem to be unwise. For instance, the committee wished to see the two representatives of the United States who are at the Carnegie works and the Bethlehem works, and word was sent that the committee would be glad to see them. The naval officers who were at the works were sent for. Two naval officers appeared. The committee supposed that they were there as the inspecting officers of the Government, but behold! they were two officers on the retired list in the employment of the Carnegie Company and the Bethlehem Iron Company.

Mr. GRAY. Whom the United States had disqualified from being there as agents of the Government.

Mr. CHANDLER. They were naval officers who had been retired, one of them upon his own application, I think, and the other for color-blindness. They appeared before us. We found that they were on the other side instead of on our side. Then we made a second request, and the two officers who represented the United States as inspecting officers at those great works appeared. I could go on and make several statements which—

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire a question.

Mr. CHANDLER. In one moment. I could go on and make several statements which tend to show that an unwise system has grown up, but I refrain.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire whether one of those retired officers of whom he speaks was in the service of Carnegie & Co. prior to the recent trouble growing out of the defective armor plate furnished by that firm to the Government? The Senator will recall that a year or so ago the Government was said to have been defrauded in the quality of certain armor plate furnished by Carnegie & Co., for which, I think, the contractors were assessed in damages something like $150,000. Whether or not it has been paid I do not know.

Mr. CHANDLER. I am not certain whether the naval officer was then in the employ of Carnegie, Phipps & Co.

Mr. ALLEN. Was he there at or prior to that time?

Mr. CHANDLER. I am not certain.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator says he is not certain.

I have only a few observations to make in reference to this matter. I presume that Nebraska is not particularly interested in naval vessels any more than any other State in the Union which pays its taxes and desires to see an efficient public service. But it occurs to me that the Committee on Naval Affairs ought to pursue this investigation assiduously and report all the facts as well as the names of naval officers who have so far forgotten their duty to the Government that while they are receiving pay from this Government they permit themselves to enter the service of a corporation whose principal business is to obtain money from the Government.

I can not agree with my friend the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY], with whom it is always a pleasure to me to agree. It occurs to me that an ordinary sense of delicacy would dictate to a man who has almost been raised in the naval service of this country at the expense of the Government, and has enjoyed the salary and emoluments and honors that come to him in consequence of his position, the propriety of refraining from putting himself in an attitude, when placed upon the retired list, which could be construed into hostility to the Government to which he owes loyalty and obedience.

It is not claimed that these retired naval officers are employed in consequence of their great ability. The claim is not placed upon that ground. It must be placed upon the ground that their association with naval officers from boyhood has given to them peculiar influence in naval circles and peculiar knowledge of Government demands and Government requirements, and thus made them more efficient in the services of contractors for naval supplies than an ordinary civilian would be who does not possess such knowledge. It is true that no man can serve two masters whose interests are hostile and at the same time be loyal to both. He must serve one to the exclusion of the other. It occurs to me that a man whose sense of delicacy is so blunt that, after having been educated by the Government and paid by it for his services almost from childhood to mature manhood, would suffer himself, when he has been retired and put upon the retired list at the expense of the Government, to enter the services of a private contractor, to use the knowledge the Government has given him in taking money from the Government and turning it over to the contractor, ought not to be permitted to enter that service as long as he is upon the retired list, and that his sense of delicacy is entirely blunted. I think the amendment should be adopted.

Mr. GRAY. Now, having said so much, perhaps it is necessary that I should say a word more in reply to the Senator from Nebraska. All this talk about blunting of sensibility, I think, so far as I know anything about the facts of the case, is out of place and does not apply certainly to anyone that I know. There is no question about lack of sensibility, or lack of personal honor, or of any of those feelings which would permit a man to put himself in any questionable attitude whatever.

The Senator will see there is everything in the way of putting it. He speaks of the question whether an officer of the Navy should seek employment with a firm having contracts with the Government. That is not the question I put. It is a question of an officer of the Navy, retired against his will, confessedly an accomplished officer, confessedly a man who has done his duty in every situation in which he has been placed, retired by a board of surgeons for some physical defect or a supposed physical defect for which he was not responsible, put upon the lowest grade of the retired list, prevented from serving his country, prevented from enjoying his rank and pay, prevented from pursuing the career of which he was proud and in which he would have been glad to have continued, and obliged to seek other employment to support himself and his family, who seeks employment in the direction in which his own experience and his own abilities would suggest, and while he is in that employment there is a contract with the Government. Is he to throw it up because the Government has chosen to avail itself of the facilities of that particular firm or association of persons doing the work? Is there anything of risk to the Government because it has a retired officer among the active employees of this firm? Certainly you can not claim that the Government will be any better off if it had a civilian employed in that position. You do not claim that the man who happens to have had no connection with the Navy is any better able to consider the interests of the Government than one who has had some attachment for it and some prejudice in its favor.

So far as the interest of the Government goes, it is idle to talk about being jeopardized; and the whole question comes back as to your care for the honor and integrity and sense of propriety of a particular officer. Now, I am quite willing to leave that to the officers themselves. I do not think that there is any propriety in it. I do not think, apart from any specific charge of double dealing, or of conduct unbecoming, as the phrase goes in court-martial, an officer and a gentleman, that we have anything to do with it. When we turn these men out and put them upon one-quarter of their original pay, when they have nearly arrived at the meridian of life, with families on their hands, I am willing to let them earn a living the best way that they can.

Mr. TILLMAN. Is it not three-quarters pay?

Mr. GRAY. Oh, no; it is not three-quarters pay. That is where they are retired for disability incurred in the service. I am speaking of a retirement not owing to a disability incurred in the service, but some physical defect.

Mr. ALLEN. Allow me to ask the Senator from Delaware, if the law is wrong in permitting these officers to be retired under such circumstances, why not repeal the law and enact one that will be just to them, and not put them in the attitude of being in the employ of private corporations?

Mr. GRAY. I would be very glad to aid in passing a law that would enable the Government to avail itself of the service of one or two, at least, of these men whom I know.

Mr. ALLEN. Why put them in the attitude of taking pay from a private company or advancing its interests against the Government and at the same time receiving pay from the Government as retired officers?

Mr. GRAY. Putting a man in the attitude of taking pay from a private company and advancing its interests against the Government, if the Senator will pardon me, I do not quite understand. I try to keep myself alive to questions of that kind and suggestions of that kind that concern personal honor. But what would prevent the Senator from Nebraska, a Senator of the United States, from performing his full duties to his Government if he happened to be the owner or manager of a concern that was doing work for the Government?

Mr. ALLEN. I would not undertake to represent the Government at all.

Mr. GRAY. Not to represent the Government, but would you undertake to represent your own concern?

Mr. ALLEN. No, I would not put myself in the attitude of being an officer of the Government and at the same time an employee or officer of a corporation that was undertaking to contract with the Government.

Mr. GRAY. Oh, I grant it—

Mr. ALLEN. The objection I make—

Mr. GRAY. Let me make my statement, and then I will not interrupt the Senator again. I grant you, of course, if one of these officers was in a position of responsibility or trust on behalf or on the part of the Government, and had to act for the Government in the slightest degree, then I would consent as quickly as the Senator could to the impropriety of his being employed by a concern that was dealing with the Government for which he had to act. But in the case we are dealing with the officer has no responsibility for the Government. He is not called upon to act for the Government in the slightest degree. He has been put aside and rendered incompetent to act for the Government. The only question is whether he may not, in earning his living honestly and lawfully and honorably, be employed by a concern that is doing work for the Government for which he once had the right perhaps to be assigned to duty.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator does not understand my position, I am sorry to say, or I do not understand his. I understood the Senator from New Hampshire to put this case: That Carnegie & Co. are large contractors with the Government for naval supplies, and when a contract was to be drawn and the agreements and specifications were to be made two retired naval officers appeared to contract and conduct the negotiations for Carnegie & Co.

Mr. GRAY. Yes; but not on behalf of the Government.

Mr. ALLEN. No; not on behalf of the Government. They appeared there to conduct the affairs of Carnegie & Co., contractors with the Government, who draw hundreds of thousands of dollars from the Government under their contract. The Senator from New Hampshire said it was supposed by those who were representing the Government for a time that these naval officers were also representing the Government.

Mr. GRAY. But did they represent themselves as representing the Government?

Mr. ALLEN. However, before the contract was completed it was discovered that they did not represent the Government, but they were in the employ of Carnegie & Co., and other officers of the Government were brought in to represent the Government.

Mr. GRAY. Was that mistake on the part of the committee due to these officers at all?

Mr. ALLEN. It may have been due, and probably was due, if the committee were intelligent—

Mr. GRAY. I do not think the Senator from New Hampshire will say so.

Mr. ALLEN. They were no doubt asked, but certainly the negotiations were conducted by these two officers.

Mr. CHANDLER. What is the inquiry?

Mr. GRAY. I said to the Senator from Nebraska that I did not think the Senator from New Hampshire would say the mistake made by the committee for a little while that these two retired officers were the inspectors of the Government was due to anything the officers themselves said or did.

Mr. CHANDLER. But it was a revelation, I will say to my friend from South Carolina. I ask the attention of the Senator—

Mr. GRAY. Will not the Senator, in justice to these officers, answer my question?

Mr. ALLEN. Let me finish my statement and then I will yield the floor.

Mr. CHANDLER. It was a matter of astonishment to us that the fact was as it appeared.

Mr. ALLEN. That is what I understand. The Senator from New Hampshire said that these two retired officers appeared there to conduct the negotiation for Carnegie & Co., and the committee supposed for some time that they were representing the Government, and finally discovered that they were not. That is the way I understand the Senator from New Hampshire to put the fact.

Mr. GRAY. All I wanted to make plain was in justice to them. I do not know that that mistake was due to anything they did or said. I should be very sorry—

Mr. CHANDLER. By no means.

Mr. GRAY. By no means.

Mr. ALLEN. No; but I suppose if they had announced plainly that they were representing Carnegie & Co. it would not have taken the committee some hours to find out that they were not representing the Government. I suppose they did not disclose that fact until something they said or did disclosed it to the committee.

Mr. CHANDLER. Oh, yes; I will say that we ascertained immediately that they were in the employment of the company.

Mr. ALLEN. I understood the Senator from New Hampshire to say in that connection there that these officers were receiving a salary from the Government at the same time.

Mr. GRAY. As retired officers.

Mr. ALLEN. I do not care what you call them.

Mr. GRAY. I say as retired officers.

Mr. ALLEN. As retired officers, something like $75 a month each.

Mr. GRAY. Yes.

Mr. ALLEN. They were receiving pay from the Government at the precise moment they were receiving pay from Carnegie & Co. to make a contract with the Government by which the Government was to expend—

Mr. CALL (in his seat). Oh, no.

Mr. ALLEN. I have the floor. If the Senator desires to interrupt me, let him interrupt me publicly.

Mr. CALL. I did not intend to interrupt the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). The Chair will suggest to Senators that if interruptions are desired they will please address the Chair and receive permission. The Senator from Nebraska will proceed.

Mr. ALLEN. They were engaged in this kind of transaction at that time, receiving compensation from Carnegie & Co., as employees of a private corporation. It would be the same if it were a private individual. There is no difference in that respect. By their intelligence, and by their knowledge of the Government, and by their knowledge of the ramifications of the Navy Department, they enabled Carnegie & Co. to get a beneficial contract from the Government, because Carnegie & Co. would not have been paying them unless the contract was of some benefit to them, and at the same time they were drawing from this Government pay as retired officers. They had received their education at the hands of the Government. They perhaps would have been no more than the balance of us common creatures that walk the earth if the Government had not educated them at its own expense. They had received all the honors and emoluments due to their position and due to their promotion from time to time. Yet the honorable Senator from Delaware says he can see nothing in that fact or in the relation they sustained to Carnegie & Co. and the Government at that time that no delicate man should not undertake.

Mr. President, if the rule announced by the Senator from Delaware is to be adopted in this country (and I am sorry to say that it has been adopted and has been the practice too long) and is to become the rule of the Government, then the beginning of the ending of this republican form of our Government is apparent. No man can honestly serve two men at the same time whose interests are diverse. These men are not employed in consequence of their extensive knowledge of machinery or anything of that kind. It is not pretended that they possess superior knowledge to a civilian in that respect. But all they have seen, the information they have acquired, and the knowledge they have obtained in the naval service of the Government, all the friendships which have extended through the years from boyhood to mature manhood, are purchased by the private employer when he employs these retired officers.

I am not in favor of permitting the naval or military officers of the Government who are retired to be placed in this position. I believe them, as a rule, to be highly honorable gentlemen. If there is anything wrong in the methods of their retirement, in the law which retires them, let us begin at the proper place, at the foundation, and rectify that law. If they are being retired for mere excuses that there is nothing in, such as color-blindness—and if it was not for color-blindness it would be for something else, probably—it is a subterfuge to start with. If they are being retired in consequence of subterfuges that are created by the fertile imaginations of retiring boards or physicians, let us retire the retiring board; let us put some restrictions upon the surgeons and doctors in the naval service; let us define by proper legislation the causes for which a man shall be retired before he reaches a certain age and restrict those causes. Let us give these men the full benefit of the life they have chosen to lead and the education they have obtained to serve the Government, and not put them in the attitude of retiring upon inadequate pay and seeking employment from private corporations dealing with the Government and obtaining money out of the Government, when at the same time and in the same breath they are receiving pay from the Government with whom they contract. It is a delicate position to be placed in. It is, Mr. President, a position in which no man with a true sense of delicacy can afford to place himself.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, as a member of the committee joining in this recommendation, I desire to say only a few words. The committee was unanimous in the opinion that the amendment should be presented and that the Senate should be asked to ingraft it upon the bill. The suggestion of its importance grew out of the practical manifestations before the committee of the evil of this system. The Senator from Nebraska has not stated with exact correctness the facts with reference to the appearance of these two officers before the committee.

Mr. ALLEN. I stated the facts just as I got them.

Mr. BACON. He stated the fact as he understood it, but it is natural that he should not have gathered it with particularity. The committee was endeavoring to ascertain whether the Government was paying too much for the armor which goes upon the battle ships. It was developed that the armor upon the battle ships costs the Government over $600 a ton, including the amounts for material furnished by the Government and the amounts paid by the Government to the Bethlehem works and the Carnegie works for the preparation of the plates. It was exceedingly difficult, of course, to get this information from outsiders. We therefore, knowing that there were officers detailed at those works for the purpose of inspecting the armor, asked that they be sent before the committee. We did not state with particularity that we desired the inspecting officers; we simply asked that the naval officers who were there should be sent; and the two who came were two comparatively young men—men, I suppose, about 40 years of age, under the age that we would ordinarily expect to find in the retired list.

Mr. GRAY. We call that age young now.

Mr. BACON. Yes; it looks so now to us. There was no deception about it whatever. There was no misapprehension on our minds as to their position. Before the examination began we knew the fact that these two officers who appeared before us were not the inspecting officers, but that they were retired officers of the Navy. One was employed at that time, and is also employed at this time, by the Carnegie works; the other was employed by the Bethlehem works. It was, as a matter of course, of some significance to us that two gentlemen, apparently in robust health and of an age fitted for active service in the Navy, should be upon the retired list, and therefore an examination as to the cause of these several retirements by the committee ensued, and it was developed that one of them was retired for color-blindness and the other for some slight physical defect which did not appear in his ordinary actions.

But here is the point to which I desire to call the attention of the Senate: Our great purpose was to ascertain the cost of the armor, what was the expense to these armor-plate manufacturers in the various processes by which they finally put out the armor plate in shape and condition to go upon the battle ships. We could not ascertain it from those two officers.

Mr. GRAY. Had you any right to expect that?

Mr. BACON. That is exactly the question that the Senator ought to have asked. We had no right to expect it of them. The Senator, by his question, has anticipated the very ground which I propose to take, that no naval officer ought to be in a position where he is not at the command and call of the Government for any information he may have.

Mr. TILLMAN. If he is receiving pay.

Mr. BACON. If he is receiving pay, he has no right to be in any employment where he can stand before a committee of the Senate or the House or any officer of the Government and either refuse to answer a question which may be asked him or occupy such a position that the one who proposes to ask it may feel that it is really a matter of delicacy to press it upon him.

Now, here was an officer occupying two confidential relations. Certainly it can not be denied that any officer of the Navy is in a confidential relation with the United States Government. He is in a confidential relation with the Navy Department. He is certainly in a confidential relation with his employer. Where the Government is engaged in a contract involving an immense amount of money, do you say that it shall not have the full benefit of any and all the knowledge which may be in the possession of a naval officer, and not simply that, but that the naval officer shall be in a position where he can represent his employer in making a contract with the Government and have the advantage of all the confidential relationship which he necessarily occupies with the Government in attempting to make a contract with it?

Mr. President, I go further than the rest of the committee. I think it is a very great evil that officers who are retired from the Navy from other causes than advanced years, and who are perfectly competent for the discharge of many of the duties that the Navy Department has need for, should be allowed to go upon a reduced pay, and only be in a position to be called into service in case of war. I do not think that a man who is retired from the naval service for any other cause than advanced years, unless it is for complete, total physical or mental disability, should be entirely relieved from the duty to perform service. I think there ought to be a radical change in the law in that particular. The two officers who were before the Naval Committee furnished all the argument that anyone would need in support of that position.

Now, there are at the Carnegie works two naval officers. One of them is on the active list, and he is detailed there as an inspector. The other is on the retired list and he is employed there at a salary. Yet there is no single duty performed by the officer on the active list, who is there as an inspector, which can not be perfectly performed by the officer on the retired list, who is there on a salary, under the employment of the works.

Mr. GRAY. I agree with you about that.

Mr. BACON. I am very glad that the Senator agrees with me. But what I say is a matter of my own individual opinion. It is not now before the Senate. The committee did not see proper to go to that extent; but the committee did think that an officer who is upon the retired list, who is still an officer of the Government, who is drawing pay from the Government, ought not to be allowed to take service with a corporation or an individual engaged in large contracts with the Government involving immense sums of money, running up into millions of dollars.

The argument of the distinguished Senator from Delaware is one addressed, of course, to the sympathy of Senators as to whether or not a retired officer who is robust and who may have a slight defect as to the ability to distinguish colors, who may be upon starvation wages, shall be condemned to live upon those wages.

I say that that argument is not sound for two reasons; that there are two reasons why that argument should not prevail; and that is the only argument which the Senator has been able to advance upon which it seems anyone could raise an objection to the recommendation of the committee as to this amendment.

In the first place, if such an officer is a man sound in body, he is not compelled to retain his position as a retired officer. At the same time, when the committee visited the Bethlehem works, when those two officers were there, there was another officer who had resigned because it was to his interest to resign and take private employment. If an officer is of the capacity which enables him to get a contract of employment with one of those great concerns, he certainly has the ability which will enable him to command a good salary, sufficient to support him outside of his retired half pay. Why should he retain this $50 or $75 a month if he can get employment at $5,000 a year? If the education which he has obtained from the Government at the Naval Academy or his experience as a naval officer has so capacitated him for this work that he can command a salary of thousands of dollars, where is the great hardship to him in saying, "If you prefer to avail yourself of the opportunity to command such a salary, then give up the pittance the Government is giving you and retire from the service"? As to a man who can command thousands of dollars by reason of the capacity he has thus acquired, is it any great hardship in putting upon him this alternative?

Again, these are not the only classes or kinds of enterprises in which retired naval officers may obtain employment. There are comparatively few of these concerns which are having contracts with the Government, very few of them, only two in the armor-plate business; whereas the whole country is filled with manufactures and enterprises of various kinds in which the services of these retired officers can be utilized; and there is no restriction sought to be placed by this law upon their employment in any of the thousands of other enterprises. It is simply intended to say to them this one single thing: "If you have such capacity that these great enterprises desire your services, you must elect whether you will serve them or whether you will serve the Government; you can not serve both"; and I can not see how there can be any hardship in putting a man thus circumstanced upon such an election.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, I should be very sorry indeed to have an issue in moral casuistry with the distinguished Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], or the distinguished Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN]. I hope that there could be no difference between us on an issue of that kind. It all comes back to the matter of fact as to the attitude of these officers toward the Government. I am afraid that the Senator from Georgia has been looking upon one side of the shield while I have been looking upon the other. The truth is not on the side at which the Senator has been looking, I am very sure; and I think I shall be able to demonstrate that to the Senate.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me, I desire to say that I am quite sure I know the particular case he has in mind.

Mr. GRAY. Very likely.

Mr. BACON. And I desire to say that the officer the Senator has in mind impressed me most favorably, and is one for whom I should be most pleased to do a kindness in any manner which might possibly be offered.

Mr. GRAY. I have no doubt of it.

Mr. BACON. And there is nothing except the simple naked question which is influential in the matter.

Mr. GRAY. Now, we differ as to the naked question, that is all; and we want to see which is right.

Mr. BACON. I thought I would state that.

Mr. GRAY. I am much obliged to the Senator, because he has done no more than justice to the gentleman whom we both have in mind.

The question is, to use the phrase of the Senator from Nebraska, if that be the proper phrase, what is the attitude toward the Government of these officers who have been heretofore retired? As I take it, it is this: The Government of the United States has said to them after due examination, "You are no longer up to the standard that we require for service in the Navy on the active list," and though they protest that they are, though they appeal to the proper authorities, they are still told by this board of navy surgeons, "You are not up to that test; and though physically and mentally you are still able in every convenient opportunity of civil life to avail yourselves to perform useful service, you can not do it for your Government; your career in the Navy is ended; you have arrived at the meridian of life; you are in the full possession, it is true, of your faculties, mental and physical, but this ideal standard of ours does not permit us longer to employ you, and you may no longer count yourselves active officers in the United States Navy, and you are put down upon this list of men who are still officers of the Navy in a sense, and may be called on in time of war, but you are absolutely precluded from taking any part in the glorious career to which you have devoted yourselves in building up the Navy or in officering its ships." They are helpless. It is against their will; but there they are. This is no money-making profession. They have not laid by a fortune, and are compelled to support themselves and their families, which I presume at this age they have gathered around them, upon the pittance of one-third or one-quarter of their former pay.

The Navy Department by its regulations did not assume so cruel a position as to say, "You are to remain in absolute idleness; you may have a prejudice in favor of your profession; you may desire to be continued upon the roll of the Navy; but if you do, you shall not lift your hands in order to earn an honest living for yourselves and your families; we will not permit you to represent us; we will not send you to Pittsburg to inspect armor on behalf of the Government"—which they would be glad to do if they were permitted—"we turn you out of every active, honorable employment on behalf of the Government; we educated you for this profession, that is true, in which you have served up to this time twenty or twenty-five years."

The naval profession, while it is an honorable profession and requires intellect and character to properly perform its duties, is not one which is exceedingly well adapted to fit a man for civil life. A man who has passed twenty-five years of life on the decks of a ship or in the profession of a naval officer does not acquire the aptitudes and the experience that permit him to go and stand abreast of his fellows of the same age and the same education and the same opportunities in the tremendous competition of civil life. Those officers who are not permitted to represent their Government, not permitted to act on its behalf at any one of these great concerns, have acquired, if they are intelligent and wide-awake men, some experience and skill in the matter of the construction of ships and of armor plate, if you please, and in other matters to which they have devoted their attention and which have been the subject-matter of their studies.

The Government does not say that they shall not avail themselves of this limited class of employment; and so they seek it and obtain it, as in the instance cited by the Senator from Georgia.

But he says, and says, I think, without authority or without justification, that these men can seek other employment. Employment is not so easy to obtain. They have got to seek it where they have experience to bring and capacity to bring and aptitude to bring to the service of the employer who will give them compensation. Being refused employment by the Government, unable to represent it in any capacity, they are employed by these concerns. How is the United States hurt? How much worse off is the Government of the United States for having a contract with a concern which employs somewhere in some one of its branches a retired naval officer in either working or superintending work in the casting of armor plate and the creation of those great steel billets? I am curious to know. Certainly the Government is no worse off than it would be if we had some one who had no association with the Navy, no prejudice, if you please, in favor of it, no attachments to it. So, if there is anything in that employment, one way or the other—I doubt whether there is much—it would be in favor of the Government.

But the man is employed by the private concern now, says the Senator from Georgia; he is occupying two confidential relations. Well, we all know that a man can not do this, and ought not to be permitted to do it if he is willing to do it. How does he occupy confidential relations with the Government of the United States? He does not represent the Government of the United States; he is not allowed to represent the Government of the United States. They turn him out, so far as that is concerned; they forbid it. He is not making a contract with himself; he is not making a contract with the Government; he is not even inspecting on the part of the Government, but he is merely employed by another man who has a contract with the Government, and he does not represent the Government in any wise, and therefore is not occupying two confidential relations.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. GRAY. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. I want to suggest a case to the distinguished Senator. Suppose an officer upon the active list is employed in the construction department. He is in daily conference and confidential relationship with the Secretary of the Navy and with all the officers in that construction branch. He knows what their views are with reference to prices, how much they are willing to give, and what is the last limit to which they can be strained. He has acquired that information by reason of his confidential relationship, and the week after he retires and goes and takes employment with the Carnegie Company or the Bethlehem Company he is in a direct position to give them all the information which will enable them to drive the hardest bargain they can with the Government, and other information which they can not get from anybody else.

Mr. GRAY. In the first place, no such situation ever existed, and I will say never can exist.

Mr. BACON. I do not see why it could not.

Mr. GRAY. I shall try to show the Senator.

Mr. BACON. These are young men, as I say, comparatively, and they have been in active, confidential relationship with the Naval Department, and all the knowledge they possess, which was acquired when they were in active connection with the Government, is available to enable those companies which they now serve to make bargains with the Government.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, everything they acquired when in the service of the Government, on the other hand, is now available for the contractor who is doing work for that Government, and presumably the contractor has the benefit, and therefore the Government has the benefit, of the skill and the knowledge which he has brought to the special work for which he was trained.

Mr. BACON. Does the distinguished Senator mean to say that the Carnegie Company and the Bethlehem Company do not at the same time have the benefit of the knowledge those officers have as to what the Department thinks about prices? It is not simply the question of knowledge by which the work is to be done, but it is knowledge by which the bargain is to be made.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, the bargains probably are not made by the commissioned officers of the Navy; they may be made by civil employees of the Department or by the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. BACON. The Navy Department is certainly in constant conference with these naval officers, and while a contract may be made on one side by the Secretary of the Navy, it is certainly made on the other side by those companies; and they are the ones to whom I refer who get their information from those officers, by which they are enabled to drive hard bargains with the Government, and it is my honest judgment that to-day the Government is paying to these armor-plate manufacturers a most enormous profit upon the material which they are furnishing for the battle ships.

Mr. GRAY. If they are making an enormous profit, I will venture to say, and stake my knowledge of human nature and affairs upon the assertion, that they are not making enormous or unjust profits by reason of the employment of these gentlemen. They are not doing it, nor can they do it.

The Senator from Georgia seems to assume, in the first place, that in these contracts the Government of the United States, before they are made, is in a position of active hostility with the contractor. On the contrary, the Navy Department has in making these contracts attempted to aid and build up these very concerns in order that the United States may have within its own borders the capacity in time of war or in time of peace to build up its own Navy; and I do not believe that a contract once made by the Navy Department with any concern brings about a state of things in which all considerations of honor, all considerations of patriotism, all considerations of truth and justice and adherence to contracts and fidelity to duty are thrown to the winds—not at all.

Mr. BACON. I must decline to allow the distinguished Senator to put any such words in my mouth or any such construction upon any language I have used.

The purposes which the Senator says the Government had in view in the building up of these establishments are subjects upon which the Naval Committee has heard a good deal of testimony directly upon that line, and upon which there has been a good deal of conflict among the owners of these establishments themselves. It is not a question of honor or patriotism; it is simply a question that is always between all parties who are trading and contracting with each other. Conceding to both sides the utmost honor and honesty, the contracts which have been made are not the contracts which are to rule for the future. Contracts are about to be made now for two battle ships, and there is a House bill providing for a number of other battle ships.

If the Senator will pardon me for so lengthy an interruption—

Mr. GRAY. I am interrupting the Senator, I am afraid.

Mr. BACON. Not at all. I am interrupting you.

The point I make, or the point the committee makes, rather, because I do not speak for myself individually, is the same principle which is recognized everywhere, that human nature is fallible, and that the most honest and upright man who ever lived is not allowed to sit on the bench in a case in which he has an interest, not because he is dishonest, not because he is unpatriotic, but because his relationship warps his judgment and prevents him from being an impartial and upright judge, and we do submit to the Senate in all earnestness—

Mr. GRAY. That is the principle you rely on?

Mr. BACON. That is the principle. We submit to the Senate in all earnestness that an officer of the Government who, if not now, has been in confidential relationship with the Government, ought not to be permitted, while still drawing pay of the Government, to assume a confidential relationship with one with whom it is about to enter into contractual relations and to give information as to the views of officers of the Government which may affect the terms of contracts which are to be made.

Mr. GRAY. There we are again, Mr. President. We began with generalities, and when we come to analyze the position the facts do not warrant the moral position, if I may use that word, which the Senator seeks to put upon it. He says that a man ought not to be a judge in his own cause and ought not to be permitted to decide where his own interests are at stake. I say so, too; but, Mr. President, think of applying that to a case of this kind, where the Government of the United States is the party that we are interested in and are trying to protect, and we object, forsooth, to having one of our own officers on the other side. Is he, indeed, a judge in his own cause? If there is any prejudice or any prepossession, is it adverse to us?

Mr. BACON. I think so.

Mr. GRAY. Not at all.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator permit me at this point?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. GRAY. Oh, yes; I always yield.

Mr. ALLEN. When a man enters the service of a private employer—putting this as a legal proposition—does he not contract to give his highest skill, all his time, his best ability, and his greatest loyalty to promote the financial interests of the employer who pays him?

Mr. GRAY. I suppose so. I am ready to admit that.

Mr. ALLEN. I am speaking as a mere proposition of law.

Mr. GRAY. I am prepared to admit that.

Mr. ALLEN. If he does not do that, that will afford an excuse to his employer to discharge him.

Mr. GRAY. Very well.

Mr. ALLEN. How can the Senator, under those circumstances, say that a man who is drawing pay from the Government as a retired officer and enters the service of a private corporation or a private individual, and by that means agrees to give his entire time, his highest ability, and his greatest loyalty to promote the interests of that private employer, at the same time be just and honest to the interests of the Government, when the interest of the Government upon the one hand is to secure the best material for the least money and the interest of the private employer, upon the other hand, is to furnish the worst material for the highest price?

Mr. GRAY. I have wearied myself, Mr. President, and I know I have wearied the Senate, in trying to explain over and over again that though he does in a legal and in a moral sense give his best endeavor, his highest skill, and his most absolute fidelity to his employer, yet the Government of the United States, for whom we are acting, has no peril and no opening for any disadvantage in having a retired officer of its own in such employment by the very terms of the Senator's own proposition.

If it be true, as might have been inferred from something which has been said in this debate, that there are two hostile camps, one the Government and the other the contractor, it would certainly be no special detriment that we should have a friend of our own in the camp of the enemy, if we are to call him such. He could not hurt the Government. The contractor might object. He might say, "I do not know about trusting you in this matter with the Government; you are an officer of the Navy and we will keep you in the background in all these matters of work upon contracts." But surely it does not lie in the mouth of the Government as a party to object; and that is what I have been trying to insist upon all along, on the low plane of interest at least, as to a matter of honorable employment.

I have said that these men are not exercising, as the Senator from Georgia said they were, two confidential relations, for they are expressly forbidden to exercise any confidential relations, on the part of the United States. That is settled; that is proven absolutely. Therefore that position is not well taken, and no argument can be built upon it, for it is not so.

Mr. BACON. What the Senator asserts is not so, and I am very sorry I can not agree with him.

Mr. GRAY. It is not true that they occupy two confidential relations.

The Senator from Nebraska might as well say that a man drawing a pension had no right to work in one of these great foundries as to say that one of these retired officers, separated entirely from the active list of the Navy, is forbidden to occupy a position of trust or confidence in such an establishment and should be forbidden to seek employment there or was unable to honorably serve there.

Mr. ALLEN. Not at all, if the Senator will pardon me for interrupting him.

Mr. GRAY. The Senator is pardoned in advance.

Mr. ALLEN. Here is a man who entered the naval service of the United States, who had been educated by the Government and paid from the time he entered the Naval Academy, who is promoted from time to time in the service of the Government as a naval officer, and who is retired after a time for some reason, which may be just or may be unjust. I am inclined to accept the position of the Senator from Delaware and to say that they are unjustly retired. That man is drawing pay right along from the Government not for services that he has rendered and from which he has been finally discharged, but he is all the time an officer of the Government.

Mr. GRAY. There is no other ground upon which you can justify paying him, except for his services.

Mr. ALLEN. He is in the service all the while. It is just like the employment of a private individual who, after serving his master for a time, the master says to him, "You may take half your time for a month or two," or whatever time may be agreed upon, "and I will pay you right along for your services at a lower rate, of course"; and that individual, while sustaining that relation to his employer, goes into the service of another man whose interest is hostile to the interest of his original employer and gives his service and his intellect to make a contract in hostility to the interest of the first employer, just as in this case the naval officer owes allegiance to the Government, and, as the Senator says, may be called into active service at any time. He is retired upon pay which the Government judges sufficient to support him. He is still in the service of the Government, getting money out of it, and will be in its service until he dies, unless the law be changed. And now, under those circumstances, while he is in the service of the Government, he is employed by one of these corporations to give the knowledge which the Government purchased for him, to give all the strength of his ability and his intellect as a business man to enter into a contract where that Government through his instrumentality may be a sufferer in the contract.

Mr. GRAY. In the first place, all this argument has been predicated upon suppositions. There is no allegation here that any man on the retired list, in the employ of any concern, has made a contract with the Government or has represented his concern in making a contract with the Government. They were employees of the concerns, and were brought here not by the concerns, but were sent for, as it appears, by the chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee, and when they came there was no doubt about the position they occupied. Senators have been arguing as if they were acting as inspectors for the Government, and were at the same time employed by the armor-plate concerns doing work for the Government.

Something was said by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN], in a question to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER], as to whether any of these officers were employed before or after a certain inquiry had been ordered in regard to armor plate or work for the Government for the Navy done by Carnegie & Co. The Senator from New Hampshire said he did not know. I do not know either, but it would not concern us here whether he had been employed before or after. The trouble about that investigation was not with reference to any retired officer, for no retired officer in the employment of that company had or could have had the slightest suspicion cast upon him as to any failure of duty to the Government. But suspicion was cast upon officers who were representing the United States Government, and it was they who should be investigated, and very properly investigated, if there was any ground for it. It was the Secretary of the Navy who was to be investigated to see whether he, by his request, had expedited the issuance of any of these patents in which the private parties were concerned. That did not touch this case at all or any case that can be supposed to apply to these officers.

All I wish to say in conclusion is that the matter has been presented, it seems to me, wrong end first, and we have got before the Senate the wrong conception of the attitude of these people. The argument has been made upon that wrong conception, I think. I have tried to correct it. I do not believe the Senate will, it certainly ought not, do injustice to these very meritorious men, who have been turned out of employment against their will and not with their consent, and who have to take employment in the only place where they can properly seek or obtain it.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, as a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, I have taken a great deal of interest in the investigation which has been under discussion here, and I have listened with a great deal of pleasure, and I must say with some amusement, to this debate, which, it seems to me, is one of taste. Senators will remember the old adage that on questions of taste people must be allowed to disagree.

The committee, I think, had in view, and very rightly, in presenting the amendment the stopping of a scandal, to prevent a man from being accused of improper or dishonorable action or even suspected of it. In investigating the question of the cost of armor we very soon arrived at the conclusion that the armor-plate manufacturers and the Government were enemies. Their interests are directly opposed to each other. The Government wants to get the armor of the very best quality at as low a price as possible. The manufacturer wants to get the last dollar possible.

Now, we find in the employ of the manufacturers two of the ablest officers of the United States Navy that I have ever met. I have not met a great many of them. I hope we have a great many like them, but I doubt it. The Government has educated those men at its own expense. It has had them in its employ until the time has come under the law when they could be retired or when they were forcibly retired, and they go upon handsome pay. They go into retirement not as beggars, as the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] says, but their pay is such that they can live comfortably if they had nothing else.

Mr. GRAY. It is $75 a month.

Mr. TILLMAN. Is that all? I think the Senator is mistaken.

Mr. GRAY. They are not retired on the longevity plan.

Mr. TILLMAN. They are retired for disability?

Mr. GRAY. They are retired for disability.

Mr. TILLMAN. Of course I do not say that a man can live handsomely on $75 a month in this community. I have discovered the contrary. But here are men who now hold the right for the balance of their lives to draw on the Treasury for so much money. That is, they come and draw their pay on the retired list. They certainly owe the Government some obligation, and if they were not in a semicapacity at least in the employ of the Government, with the right of the Government to call on them, they would be under no moral obligation—

Mr. GRAY. That is right.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator acknowledges that they are under a moral obligation to the Government of some kind. Let us see to what extent it goes. They are now in the employ of enemies of the Government, men who, I said, are trying to get all they can out of the Government. They are using the skill which the Government has furnished them in educating them; they are using the technical knowledge in the management and construction of ships which they received from the Government in helping the enemies of the Government to cheat the Government or to rob it. If that is not a position in which no honorable man would like to be placed, I ask the Senator from Delaware just to tell me what sort of a position it is?

Mr. GRAY. As the Senator from South Carolina puts the question, I will agree with him entirely, and that is the trouble all through this debate. You put the question in such guise as snits your own argument. But that does not suit the facts. That is what I have been trying to show. I will agree with the Senator perfectly, that in the way he puts it he is right; but let me ask the Senator, if I am not trespassing on his patience—

Mr. TILLMAN. Certainly not.

Mr. GRAY. This is a matter of some importance, perhaps. He says that he has in the course of the performance of his duty as a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs discovered that the contractors and the Government are enemies.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have.

Mr. GRAY. Are they enemies after the contract is made in the same sense that they were before?

Mr. TILLMAN. Of course they are, for this reason—

Mr. GRAY. Not if they are honorable men.

Mr. TILLMAN. Wait a moment. We are trying to discuss what is an honorable man. Suppose the contractors discover that they have an armor plate which has cost them several thousand dollars to manufacture, the plates weighing 30 or 40 tons, in which there are some flaws and defects, and the officer of the Government, who is receiving Government pay, knows that the plate is not an honest one under the contract, could he come and tell us so? Would he not lose his employment with the company if he did?

Mr. HALE. Let me ask the Senator from South Carolina a question.

Mr. TILLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. Did the investigation by the committee disclose a single case where a naval officer in such employ had ever disclosed any defects to the Government?

Mr. TILLMAN. Does the Senator mean a retired officer?

Mr. HALE. A retired officer.

Mr. TILLMAN. We never have heard of one of them hinting that there was anything wrong with the manufacture of armor plate or that the Government had ever been cheated in the slightest particle. Let us put it in this way: Suppose, instead of saying that the manufacturers are enemies, which, of course, is a little stretch of the imagination—

Mr. GRAY. Say they are antagonists.

Mr. TILLMAN. Say they were British or Spanish people, against whom we just now have a kind of aversion.

Mr. GRAY. Say they are antagonists.

Mr. TILLMAN. Say these manufacturers were somebody else, an actual enemy, and that these naval officers were in their employ while receiving our pay, does the Senator think it would be right for the officers, while they are on our retired list, to go into the employment of the enemy?

Mr. GRAY. I agree with the Senator in that respect.

Mr. TILLMAN. I think we will get the Senator down to a point where he will withdraw his objection and let the committee amendment go through.

Mr. GRAY. Go on and let us see.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator said a little while ago that we were acting only for the Government. We are appropriating money for both sides.

Mr. GRAY. How?

Mr. TILLMAN. We are appropriating to pay the retired officers in the employ of our enemy.

Mr. GRAY. We pay them whether they are so employed or not.

Mr. TILLMAN. Very well. We want them to get out of that, as a matter of decency, as a matter of taste. We want them to get into an employ in which the Government has no interest, in which their talents can not be used to cheat the Government.

Mr. GRAY. How can their talents be used to cheat the Government?

Mr. TILLMAN. These officers are right here using their technical skill in drawing up contracts for the company, and they get every advantage they can in drawing specifications for the contractors.

Mr. GRAY. Do they make contracts for armor plate?

Mr. TILLMAN. They are here as representatives of the contractors to draw contracts between the Government and the factory.

Mr. GRAY. I have asked once or twice whether anybody knows that fact. I have not received any reply.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Secretary of the Navy now meditates making a contract with these two concerns, who are in combination and not competing with each other, for $3,000,000 worth of armor for the Kentucky and the Kearsarge, and of course these two retired naval officers are giving their employers their very best service in every direction to get the highest price for that armor.

Mr. GRAY. The question I asked was whether the officers were acting for their concerns in making contracts; whether they were the hand or mind that made the contract?

Mr. TILLMAN. We do not pretend to know who is coming forward as the putative bidder. We suppose the Bethlehem works and the Carnegie Iron Works, the only two concerns in this country that can manufacture armor plate, will be the only bidders. We present the spectacle, I may say, as we are entering on the question of armor plate, although it is not the right time, because we have not got to that question, of putting our hands in the handcuffs of these two companies. They have formed a trust, and, to the best of my knowledge and belief, I am ready to take oath to it, they propose to rob this Government because you have on the statute books a law requiring us to use only American armor. Therefore we are in the position of giving to a monopoly the right to charge the United States $800 a ton for armor which they have sold to the Russian Government for $300.

Mr. GRAY. Why do you not repeal the law?

Mr. TILLMAN. Very well; I am ready to go with you to repeal it. I am willing to give preference to the American industry; I want to have armor plate for American vessels made in the United States, but I am unwilling to see monopolies grow rich by putting their hands into the pockets of the United States and taking out as much as they want.

Mr. GRAY. Let us get back to these officers.

Mr. TILLMAN. These officers are in an unfortunate position. Perhaps they do not realize it, and I am perhaps unfortunate that I can not see the matter as the Senator from Delaware does. He thinks it is honorable and in good taste for men who are in the employ of the Government to go into the employ of our enemies.

Mr. GRAY. I agree with the Senator about enemies.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the armor-plate manufacturers who have been trying to get the last dollar from the Government are not enemies, what are they?

Mr. GRAY. We ought not to have anything to do with them.

Mr. TILLMAN. How?

Mr. GRAY. By not making any contracts with them. If they are enemies in the sense in which the Senator from South Carolina asserts that they are, then I say that it is the duty of the Navy Department, it is the duty of Congress, to cut short all connection between us and them.

Mr. TILLMAN. That is begging the question. We must have armor made somewhere. We either have to repeal the law by which we are forced to buy American armor—and I have heard that all the armor-plate manufacturers of the world are now forming a trust to rob the governments of the world—

Mr. GRAY. Very likely.

Mr. TILLMAN. The only thing we can do would be to have an armor establishment of our own, and take these skilled people whom we have educated and put them there, and put the material there, and make our own armor.

Mr. GRAY. These gentlemen will be very glad if you will.

Mr. TILLMAN. Let it be clearly and distinctly understood that so far as this discussion and these individual gentlemen are concerned, I have no personal feeling in the world.

Mr. GRAY. I understand.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have no feeling about it.

Mr. GRAY. I understand.

Mr. TILLMAN. I never met them prior to the time when they came before the committee. I never heard anything about it until they came there. Then we discovered the position which they occupied toward the Government and toward the people who are furnishing the Government with armor.

It is a scandal, in my opinion. I may differ with the Senator from Delaware as to what is good taste and what is decent and what is honest, but still I believe we ought to require that no officer of this Government, either active or retired, shall receive its pay and then go into an employ and use the brains which he has had educated at the expense of the Government to the disadvantage of the Government.

Mr. GRAY. Before the Senator from South Carolina sits down, I should like to ask him a question, because this is the real point in the case, laying aside all speculation about the honesty of these men. Is it not to the interest of the United States Government, when it makes a contract with any one of these concerns, to get the best possible skill in the performance of the contract?

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. GRAY. How is the Government injured, then, on the reasoning of the Senator if—

Mr. TILLMAN. Why—

Mr. GRAY. One moment. How is the Government injured if these officers possess superior skill and it is devoted to making the best possible product?

Mr. TILLMAN. We do not say the Government is injured at all. We are simply trying to prevent that feeling of wrong on the part of the taxpayers that here are men whom they have educated and trained using the skill and the education the Government has given them in aid of men who are not working for the Government's interest. We want the skill on our side and the honesty, too.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the committee has not gone very far in this matter. It might have gone a great deal further. It might have asked Congress to forbid the employment in any private enterprise of naval officers, active or retired, who are receiving salary from the Government upon the ground that the Government is entitled to their entire life and service. But the committee has not gone to that extent. The committee does not believe in that. I do not for one. I see no great objection, no pertinent objection, no conclusive objection, if an officer is not needed in the service of the Navy of the United States, to his taking employment in private concerns that develops his mind, broadens his understanding, makes him more competent, and makes him a better officer when restored to duty than if he laid off and rusted up. So the committee do not go to that extent.

The only object sought by the amendment reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs is that retired officers shall not be employed by private establishments who are manufacturing armor for the Government at enormous prices; that in those limited concerns, only two or three in all, leaving the whole domain of American business life and manufactures outside and untouched, naval officers shall not be employed by men who are in a sense the enemies of the Government; that is, very antagonistic. They are opposed. They seek one thing and the Government seeks another thing. The two are diametrically opposite, and in that sense they are inimical and enemies.

If the Senator from Delaware is right, there is no limit to which corporations or private contractors with the Government are to be held. An officer of the Navy at the head of the Ordnance Department or the Engineer Department or the Construction and Repair Department may, upon retirement, forced retirement, voluntary retirement, at once be translated into the employment of a company that is making contracts with the Government and seeking enormous prices for its wares, and it may receive the benefit of all he has done as the head of that Bureau. I agree with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] that that would be in its effect and upon its face a scandal. It could never fail to receive attention and public remark and public censure. Therein those most harmed, if anybody is harmed by this discussion, are the naval officers themselves, honorable men, educated honorably, with honorable lives, who never ought to be put into a condition where they can be the subjects of such discussion.

I go further. I would not have any officer in the Navy, however well grounded his integrity may be, however it may be his by inheritance or by long life, submitted, when he is acting for the Government with these contractors, to the possible thought that one year from that time his employment may be changed and that, instead of representing the Government, he may be in the employment of one of the concerns with which he is dealing at that time. I would have all of those things removed. Everything that is in the domain of temptation ought to be removed. A naval officer ought never to be in the situation which has been alluded to here, where, when a committee is seeking to investigate into the rights of the Government, it can not enforce a question upon him, because the natural delicacy of his situation in the employ of a rival, inimical concern forbids his answering. That is all the committee says.

I am free to say that I do not understand why it is, going no further than this, that objection is made. I can not appreciate and I can not enter into the condition and the reasoning of the Senator from Delaware. I can understand how in individual cases it might work a hardship, but as I have said, to exclude a naval officer from the employment of two or three contracting firms and leave him the whole vast field of American enterprise outside of that is not a great hardship. It is not a great hardship to the officers who are in the employment of these two concerns—if it is thought better to correct the condition that has been so well described by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]—that that situation should be relieved when, as I say, all the rest of the mechanical world and the business world is left to these men to resort to. So it looks like a one-sided question.

Mr. LODGE. I desire merely to ask the Senator from Maine whether I am to understand the committee had before them the Government inspectors at the iron works and also the two naval officers employed by the iron works and asked them in regard to the profits made on armor plate.

Mr. HALE. That has been stated in debate and stated as the Senator indicates. I do not think I went into that question. That is the fact, explained, I think, by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER], that the committee sent for the naval officers, having in mind the Government inspectors, and instead of their coming these other officers appeared whom the committee did not expect, to wit, the representatives of the contracting firms. As has been stated by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], I think, when questions as to the cost and the profits of the concerns were put to the officers the committee was unable to gain any information from them in regard to it. The Senator from Delaware interposed to ask if the committee had any right to expect it.

Mr. LODGE. Very well. They testified, and so far as they did testify it was to the effect that the prices were not excessive.

Mr. HALE. I think the impression that the committee got from the examination was that the officers, under the circumstances and conditions, did not wish to be put to examination. I will say further that when the Government inspectors—

Mr. LODGE. I was going to ask how they testified.

Mr. HALE. They testified that the cost of armor, instead of being $450 or $500 a ton, was about $250 a ton. The committee found no sense of embarrassment as to them, because they had but one interest. They were there in the interest of the Government, to watch and to report. They had no concern whatever with the contracting parties, who are dealing with the Government, and the committee had no difficulty in eliciting information from them. I think, perhaps, the contrast between the two sets of officers was what brought the committee sharply to its conclusion that there was almost or quite a scandal and it ought to be stopped.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] will allow me, I did not think they ought to be asked. I realized that they had, with permission of the Navy Department, gone into the employ of these two concerns for large salaries, and I really thought we ought not to press them to make reply. There we were with those two naval officers, comparatively young men, and we were not at liberty, I thought, to ask them to state facts within their own knowledge.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me, I think it is proper to add that not only did it not appear to the committee proper to press them, but they were not in fact pressed.

Mr. CHANDLER. They were not.

Mr. BACON. They were not pressed by the committee so soon as the embarrassment became apparent.

Mr. HALE. They certainly were not. As soon as the committee realized the condition which the officers evidently felt that they were in, the committee refrained from further pressure in that direction and went to the other officers, who represented the Government alone.

Mr. LODGE. I raised the question simply because it seems to me that that single fact shows the evil of the existing system. As I understand it, the amendment of the committee is not aimed at any individual, and no reflection is cast upon any of these officers; but it aims at a system, and it certainly seems to me that it is a very bad system, which makes such things possible, particularly the point made by the Senator from Maine at the end, that an officer at the head of a bureau knows that he may at any time get employment from one of these contractors. I think that is a situation in which no naval officers should be put. It seems to me only just to make it impossible for those conflicting interests ever to meet in the same hands.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, the Senate passed a resolution in the early part of the present session which required the Committee on Naval Affairs to ascertain various things about these contracts made by the Government. The resolution was evidently intended especially to look into the matter of the contract with the Carnegie Company. The intimation at that time, and the suggestion of the resolution itself, was that the officers of the Government (and I do not mean these retired officers) had had some interest in that contract, or that they had not performed their full duty to the Government. The case attracted a great deal of attention. I assume to-day, and I should like to have the information in regard to it now, that the Naval Committee have examined very thoroughly into all the allegations made at that time. Those allegations were very broad, and the whole country was shocked to suppose that any high officer of the Government, acting for the Government, had been in collusion with the contractors, or that the Government had received, because of inattention to duty, armor and steel plates and steel tubes for guns that were not fit for service.

I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire if I am to understand, and if the Senate is to understand, because no report has been made by the Committee on Naval Affairs, that after their examination they find nothing more serious than the fact that two or three or four retired officers who were not charged with any duty by the Navy Department have been employed, and that is all there is in the investigation? Do I understand that to be the case?

Mr. CHANDLER. Does the Senator want a reply?

Mr. GORMAN. I ask the Senator from New Hampshire, who has introduced the pending amendment.

Mr. CHANDLER. I say, by no means has that been the whole subject-matter of the investigation. The Senator has not accurately stated the resolution. If the Senator will read it I shall be very glad to answer specifically; but I think that there was no implication, such as will be found in the Senator's remarks, in reference to high officers of the Government. There was, I think, a direction to inquire whether officers of the Government were interested in patents, and that question has been the subject of inquiry. The committee have not finished; they have made no report; they are not ready to make any report; but I suppose the different members of the committee, as the debate upon the naval appropriation bill proceeds, will be able to give to the Senator from Maryland all the information he may desire in reference to the various branches of the resolution. There was disclosed some connection of naval officers with patents used in work done for the Government and questions have been under consideration in reference to the propriety of the connection of naval officers with patents used by the Government. The largest question that has been under investigation has been the price of armor. The Senator will see that that is the first clause in the resolution. I should like the Senator to read the first clause in the resolution of inquiry, if the Senator has it.

Mr. GORMAN. I will read it:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be directed to inquire whether the prices paid, or agreed to be paid, for armor for vessels of the Navy have been fair and reasonable, and as low as the prices charged by the same manufacturers to foreign governments.

Mr. CHANDLER. That was left out of the resolution at the Senator's suggestion, the Senator will remember.

Mr. GORMAN. I have the resolutions as they were introduced.

Mr. CHANDLER. Yes. I will say to the Senator that subsequently, after the passage of the resolution, the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH] introduced a bill providing for a Government armor-plate manufactory, and the committee have investigated that subject in connection with the first clause of the resolution which the Senator has read. The Senator from New Jersey has introduced also an amendment to the pending bill, in which he provides that no contracts for armor shall be made under the pending bill at a cost of more than $300 a ton. The greater portion of the work of the committee has been the investigation of those two subjects.

Mr. GORMAN. The Senator from New Hampshire will remember, of course, the debate, and my surprise at the time the resolution was offered at the broad intimation of undue relation with this subject on the part of officers of the Government. I do not now refer to these retired officers and the contractors. So far as I know, and the Senate knows, the result of that deliberation is contained in the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire, which simply prohibits these retired officers from being in the employ of any firm that is furnishing armor and armor plate to the Government and the further amendment, which I suppose will be offered in due course of time, to prohibit an officer of the Government from being connected with any patents—

Mr. HALE. Let me say to the gentleman from Maryland that these amendments are by no means the sum of the outcome of the investigation. They are only incidental and moved by the vote of the committee, because they naturally attach to provisions of the naval appropriation bill. It should not be said that the investigation is concluded by these amendments, or that they involve all the investigations and results that the committee reached, by any means.

Mr. GORMAN. I am very glad to have that information from the Senator, and that comes to the point I desire to make. If, as the Senator from New Hampshire says—and it is confirmed by the distinguished Senator in charge of the bill—the main investigation has been as to the cost of the armor, the amount that the Government is paying for it, whether excessive or not, that report and that information, which is more important than the mere prohibition of two officers who are on the retired list from serving in a subordinate capacity at Bethlehem and at Pittsburg, ought to be before the Senate before we appropriate the immense sums contained in the bill for future armor.

Mr. HALE. If the Senator draws that argument of course it can not be helped. I think any Senator will see the pertinency and the force of that, so far as it goes. It is a condition that we find ourselves in. Undoubtedly the investigation conducted by the committee, involving great time and labor (and which I may say here as a member of the committee, while I do not represent it in making a report, has not reflected upon the integrity of any naval officer), is a fair subject of consideration with reference to future appropriations, and the Senator must make the most of it. When we come to that portion of the bill which has been passed over, to wit, the construction of the ships and the large expense involved—

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, it has been brought into the discussion already upon this proposition. I find by the amendment itself, dropping for the moment the cost of the armor, that the committee propose to limit the prohibition to any officer on the retired list from acting in a private capacity where the Government has a contract with the party only to the appropriations of the bill, without attempting to make it a general law. If the rule is a good one, such employment should be made unlawful after a date fixed. If you desire to make it a permanent provision, let it be enacted that from the appropriations herein contained or hereafter made, which is the usual provision, such employment shall be unlawful. I ask the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], who is a lawyer, whether that will cover the case. It may. I do not think it would.

But, Mr. President, that provision alone is insignificant. The general rule, stated so well by the distinguished Senator from Maine, is correct. There ought to be, in my judgment, a general law upon this subject, not only for the naval officers and the Marine Corps, but for the retired officers of the Army. They are spread all over the country. It is not confined to the contractors for armor or the supplies for the Navy. It goes to every extent, to railroad companies who contract to carry the mails, and steamship companies. It has been the rule. It has been permitted, and heretofore it has never been considered against the interests of the Government. To condemn these officers in the broad terms in which the condemnation has gone forth to-day I think is unjust to these gentlemen. Personally I do not know them.

Mr. HALE. I think, if the Senator will allow me, the personal expression with regard to these officers has been very kindly.

Mr. GORMAN. Yes.

Mr. HALE. In fact, it has been disclaimed that there was anything reflecting upon them or their integrity.

Mr. GORMAN. No; except the statement that an honorable man could not have been in that position.

Mr. HALE. No.

Mr. GORMAN. That is a very broad statement.

Mr. HALE. I would not go so far as that by any means. When these officers accepted this employment, as the Senator says, it was a thing that was going on broad and large everywhere, and they are not to be blamed. Their situation at present is unfortunate. I would not go so far as to say that, remaining as they do, it stamps them with dishonorable motives. I think that the operation and outcome of this discussion will be that the thing will be ended hereafter, whether we put this into the form of concrete law or not. I do not believe that any Secretary hereafter will permit anything of this kind. But it is better, as the Senator suggests, to make it a provision of law, and I should agree with him that it ought to apply to officers of the Army as well as the Navy. However, I only rose for the purpose of disclaiming, so far as I know, and so far as I have listened to the debate, any reflection upon these officers personally.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator from Maryland permit me?

Mr. GORMAN. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. As I perhaps went further than any other Senator, and with my usual frankness expressed my own honest convictions, I desire now with equal frankness to disclaim any assertion, insinuation, or anything else reflecting upon the honor and integrity of these gentlemen. I simply said that, in my judgment, I believe it is not a proper thing to do or to exist, and we are trying to stop it.

Mr. GORMAN. As to the proposition to stop it, that is a distinct proposition, and the one I am getting at. Senators have discussed it, and among others the Senator from South Carolina, who is frank and manly in his statement and general views, and I am in accord with him; but it ought not to go out to the country that there is anything to condemn these officers for when the facts are understood.

Now, what were the facts? In 1887 we were without the facility in the country to make a single ounce of armor that was fit to go on a ship. The then Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Whitney, sought these manufacturers. It was not a matter that they sought for; he sought them. He finally induced the Bethlehem Company to put up an establishment for the manufacture of armor and shafts and other paraphernalia necessary for the construction of war vessels. He did this after an examination as to the prices abroad. He, the Secretary of the Navy, acting for the Government, fixed the Government price which he would pay for so many thousand tons of armor. There was unquestionably an intimation—not a contract, but an intimation—that if they agreed to furnish armor at the price named by the Navy Department it would necessarily follow that the contracts made in the next two or three years thereafter would go to that firm, as no human being or no set of human beings would have undertaken to expend seven or eight million dollars to create that plant without such an understanding.

They went on and furnished the armor at $575 a ton, as the statement shows. As we progressed and Congress became more anxious about the construction of war vessels, moving along faster than the Department or this firm could furnish the material, Mr. Whitney's successor, the distinguished gentleman from New York, Mr. Tracy, sought the Carnegies. The Carnegies did not seek the Department. Mr. Tracy pressed them to put up a plant that would enable them to make armor and the other heavy steel pieces necessary in the construction of vessels. Mr. Tracy, without public notice, as Mr. Whitney, the former Secretary, had done, entered into a contract with them on the 20th of November, 1890, giving them precisely the same price as his predecessor, Secretary Whitney, had given the Bethlehem Company.

Now, those contracts were considered by everybody as low, as reasonable, and as much in the interest of the Government as ever contracts were made. Congress justified them.

Then came the discovery of the use of nickel in the manufacture of steel. It was an experiment not known to the world. It was doubtful as to its results. As the Senator from Maine will remember, the Senate, by a unanimous vote in the last hour of the consideration of the appropriation bill, gave to Mr. Tracy, then the Secretary of the Navy, power to spend a million dollars without question and without contract, so as to introduce it into the manufacture of the steel for these vessels, if not the guns. He changed the contract with the contractors furnishing the nickel.

The result was that the whole world was amazed at what American ingenuity had done. Up to that time, and up to this time, so far as I know, at least so far as the time when the resolution was introduced to investigate these officers, I never heard it questioned that any Secretary of the Navy or any officer at the head of the Ordnance Board, or any of the subordinates under him, ever had the slightest interest in the outcome of those contracts. They had no more to do with the prices than the Senator from Georgia and myself.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator from Maryland permit an interruption?

Mr. GORMAN. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. I desire to say that all the matters about which the Senator is speaking have been testified to at length before the committee; and I want to ask the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], who is the senior member of the Committee on Naval Affairs in the absence of the chairman, whether he will take the responsibility of furnishing the Senate with the evidence, which up to this point has not been made public? I feel quite sure that the committee would justify him in so doing.

Mr. HALE. If the Senator from Maryland will permit me, I will answer that I do not see the least objection to making the testimony public. It has not been done up to this time, being kept only for the committee, as is customary with investigations of that kind; but I see no objection whatever to the testimony now being made public, so that the Senate in the further consideration of the bill may have the benefit of that investigation.

I wish to say further that there is nothing in the testimony that in any degree implicates any of the officials of the Navy Department as to any connection with these contracts. One thing the committee did find out, however, which the Senator will appreciate, that what Secretary Tracy had in his mind, a rival establishment to keep the bids down and protect the Government, had practically disappeared. The committee did not find that there is now any rivalry between these two companies. On the other hand, it is practically a conjoint monopoly instead of a rivalry.

Mr. GORMAN. I think if the Senator's inquiry will go a little further he will find that that is world-wide; that there is an understanding not only in this country, but in England as to the price of armor. When you talk about a combine and a monopoly, it is world-wide.

Mr. HALE. It may be unfortunate, may it not?

Mr. GORMAN. That is a question. That remains to be discussed when the facts are presented, that it is not confined to these two concerns in the United States.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. GORMAN. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. I desire simply to ask a question on the point which the Senator made about nickel steel. Nickel-steel plates were made in France before they were made here. The first plate was the compound English plate. The next plate was the Creusot plate, made in France, in which the nickel was added. It was after that that the purchase of nickel to which the Senator refers was made or the authority to purchase it was given. The great process that has been invented here is the Harvey process, I think, which combines the carbonizing of the nickel process.

Mr. GORMAN. I think the Senator is more accurate than I was in stating precisely how it was.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator from Maryland allow me a word?

Mr. GORMAN. Certainly.

Mr. CHANDLER. I understood the Senator to say that he thought the armor manufacturers of Europe were in a combine. Did he mean to say that our two armor manufacturers are in the same combine?

Mr. GORMAN. What I mean to say is that the price of armor is practically fixed all over the world. The English get it slightly cheaper than we do.

Mr. CHANDLER. That is because there is no competition anywhere.

Mr. GORMAN. There is not practically any competition. There are only a few great firms that the Governments could afford to deal with. The Bethlehem Company two years ago made a bid for armor for the Russian Government for two ships at almost half the cost that they furnished it to their own Government. That question came up here and was thoroughly discussed, because a provision was attempted to be inserted to the effect that no contract should be made with any firm in this country for a greater amount per ton than they had contracted for with a foreign government. When it came to be examined into we found that this enterprising concern, with not enough to do, as they supposed, to keep their wheels going and their machinery in operation, had desired to introduce at a loss the American manufacture to the Russian Government. They had the contract, and the result was that the examination on the other side showed that it was so much superior to anything the Russian Government could get that they have ordered from this company further armor at about the same price the Government is now paying; and by that one single act they have been enabled to ship large quantities of armor and other products of their furnaces abroad until it looks, and for the first time in the history of the country, as if we would compete with England in sending our steel blooms from this country to London and to Liverpool.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. GORMAN. With pleasure.

Mr. TILLMAN. You said it was found by the Senate two years ago when the amendment was offered prohibiting higher prices than those at which any firm had sold to a foreign government. Who found it? How did you find it? This committee has been investigating here for four months, getting all the experts of our own that we could, and everybody else. We have gone to the works and seen the process from the crude ore to the finished plate, and it was all a guess with us. We have never yet been able to find a man who can pretend to say what the cost is. The contractors will not tell us; and when they undertake to say that they have sold armor to the Russian Government at a loss in order to keep their hands employed, I do not believe it.

Further, it has come out—I do not know who announced it, but it dropped in committee from some responsible member thereof—that when the original contract was made with the Bethlehem works and the Government sought the Bethlehem people and asked them to go to extraordinary expense, and a promise was made that the Government would continue to use that plant to manufacture armor—which promise was afterwards broken by the employment of Carnegie—the statement was made that the original price contemplated that the Government would create these works at its own expense, give them to these people, and then let them go in the first cost of the first order. So we stand to-day in the condition apparently of having built those works at Bethlehem ourselves with Government money and given them to the Bethlehem Company, and when we ask them to come forward and have some regard to decency and patriotism and give us somewhere like a reasonable price, they say, "Oh, we can not do it." That is the situation.

When Senators talk about finding that armor has been sold to the Russian Government at a loss, I should like to know how they found it out and from whom they found it out?

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, I say we found it, and we found it as we find other facts. The committee who had charge of the bill had before them men of ability, men of technical knowledge, men who were engaged in these enterprises, and from information so obtained—not under oath, it is true, because we had no power to investigate as had the Senator's committee—we came to the conclusion that the statements of these honorable men were correct, that they knew more about it than we did; and now the result has unquestionably proved the wisdom of the course adopted.

If we had adopted such a proposition, that no contract should be made except at the price of $325 per ton, I think it was—I speak now from memory—then the contract for all the vessels that we had ordered by that bill would have been given to the Carnegie firm; and as the Carnegie concern were induced to manufacture this armor not because of the price alone, but because of the demand of the Government for armor to be delivered in greater quantities than the Bethlehem works could deliver it, we should have destroyed the very object the Government had in view when it contracted with Carnegie. The final result has been, at which I have no doubt the Senator from South Carolina will rejoice with me, that we can compete, and are now competing, with the English manufacturers and furnishing armor to the Russian and other governments, thereby extending our trade, giving employment to our people, and making thrift the order of the day if this shall continue for a year or two longer. That is the great object.

Have we paid for those establishments? I say to the Senator from South Carolina, of course the Government has paid for those establishments. We entered upon the enterprise because we wanted them.

Mr. TILLMAN. Why, then, do they belong to the other people and not to us?

Mr. GORMAN. Oh, Mr. President, the Government was not itself in a condition to build a great establishment of this sort.

Mr. TILLMAN. Why?

Mr. GORMAN. It was economy, it was wisdom, to let men of knowledge and ability undertake to do it. It would have cost us untold millions if we had taken our own officers and attempted to do it.

Mr. TILLMAN. One minute, if the Senator will allow me. Our investigation proved that Captain Jaques, an officer of the Navy, is the creator of the Bethlehem Iron Works. He planned the whole thing and built it; and therefore the skill has been furnished by the Government, the money has been furnished by the Government, and we have made a present of the plant to that corporation.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President—

Mr. HALE. I do not want to interrupt the Senator, but it is evident that the debate on the bill can not be closed to-night, and unless the Senator desires to go on to-night, I will move an adjournment.

Mr. GORMAN. Not at all. Any time will suit me.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 4992) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Navy to donate four pieces of condemned cannon and four pyramids of condemned cannon balls to the city of Reedsburg, Wis.; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills:

A bill (H. R. 2265) to provide for reimbursement of the expense of constructing a sewer upon the permanent reservation at Hot Springs, Ark.;

A bill (H. R. 3852) to amend the record of William H. De Freest;

A bill (H. R. 4265) granting a pension to Eliza Wilson; and

A bill (S. 2557) granting a pension to Sarah A. Boyd.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 4992) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Navy to donate four pieces of condemned cannon and four pyramids of condemned cannon balls to the city of Reedsburg, Wis., was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 11 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, April 28, 1896, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, April 27, 1896.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was read and approved.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE OF RINAKER AGAINST DOWNING.

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Speaker, I desire leave of the House for an extension of time for the filing of the views of the minority in the contested-election case of Rinaker against Downing. There is no objection on the part of the committee, and I ask that the time be extended until Wednesday of this week.

Mr. DINGLEY. How long was the extension to be?

Mr. MOODY. Two days.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

FREDERICK D. DAWSON, WIFE, AND DAUGHTER.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, during the discussion of the deficiency bill on the 20th of April, speaking to an item therein contained to reimburse Frederick D. Dawson and family, I made a statement that the appropriation was recommended by the State authorities of Nebraska. I find, on reexamination, that the recommendation was made not by the State authorities, but by the Secretary of State. Among the papers submitted to the Committee on Appropriations, and which I examined, there was a summary of the evidence preceding the recommendations. Through inadvertence and, I think, by turning two pages instead of one, I charged the recommendation to the State authorities, while, as a matter of fact, I should have attributed it to the Federal Department of State. I make this suggestion with a great deal of regret, as I fear I influenced the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS], who was making a strong attack upon the amendment, to withdraw his opposition. As the matter has not yet been finally disposed of, I submit it to the House for such action as it may deem proper.

Mr. MEACER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say in that regard that I have received a letter from the governor of Nebraska, and doubtless my colleague has received a similar letter, in which a copy of the communication addressed to the Secretary of State shows that the Dawsons were negligent in the prosecution for the assault, if the McCartys were to blame in the matter; and from the information I have received from the governor I am inclined to the opinion that had we had that information at the time the matter was under consideration the item of $2,800 would have been stricken out of the appropriation bill, and I regret very much that the information has come too late. The only recourse, I judge, would be in the Senate.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Allow me to say, in reference to the remarks of my colleague, that I have received no communication whatever from the governor. The appropriation was not $2,800; it was only $1,800. The recommendation or want of recommendation on the part of the governor of Nebraska entirely apart, I still insist the appropriation was wisely and properly made.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I should like the gentleman from Nebraska to state briefly the circumstances. What was the appropriation made for?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. The appropriation was $1,800, and was made to reimburse these persons for an assault made upon them, including damage to and destruction of their property.

Mr. KEM. Mr. Speaker, I ask for order. We can not hear what is going on.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks for order. The Chair thinks he is entitled to have it, and hopes he may get it. Gentlemen in the aisles will please take their seats and cease conversation.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. On page 4168 of the RECORD, under date of April 20, will be found by the gentleman from New York a statement of the facts, which are substantially correct. No question is made on that statement of the facts connected with the assault by the governor or anyone else. In my remarks at that time I called attention to the fact that the Dawsons failed to prosecute the McCartys for the assault which had been made upon them. As to the reasons for their failure to make the prosecution I have nothing to say now, and had nothing to say at that time. I simply suggested other considerations as reasons for the allowance of the claim. It seemed to me, while it was a case of conflicting evidence, yet the assault being conceded, its character conceded as unjustifiable and the circumstances disgraceful, and where, as here, it was strongly insisted by the British Government that the compensation should be made—where a settlement could be made on such easy terms—it seemed to me we were doing the right and sensible thing in making this small appropriation. I adhere to that opinion; but in justice to the State authorities, I improve the first opportunity to say that on a re-examination I find they simply submitted a statement relating to the case, and made no specific recommendation respecting the allowance or disallowance of any claim for damages.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I desire to ask the gentleman why the State authorities of Nebraska opposed the allowance of the claim?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I do not know whether they are opposed or not. The letter which my colleague reports to have received from the governor leaves me much in doubt as to what he does think wise and proper. I construe it as conceding the case to the Dawsons, but suggesting that no large allowance be made. My only purpose, however, is to set myself straight in the matter, giving to the House the information upon which it may, if so advised, recall its action respecting the item.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I understand the gentleman to indicate that the governor of the State had opposed the payment.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I make no further statement as to that. My colleague has a letter to which my attention had never been called until a few moments ago. The letter speaks for itself. I hope my colleague will make the letter a part of his remarks. It will then go into the RECORD, and members will have the data on which they may, if they so desire, revise or vacate their former action.

[Mr. MERCER addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. MERCER. Mr. Speaker, I ask to have this letter, which is a copy of one addressed by the governor of Nebraska, Silas A. Holcomb, to Secretary of State Olney, inserted in the RECORD, as a statement of the governor's opinion in relation to this case.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I think we had better know something about it now, while we are discussing the bill.

Mr. MERCER. If the gentleman desires, I will ask to have the letter read now. It is not long.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I should like to hear it read. There being no objection, the letter was read as follows:

APRIL 23, 1896.

SIR: Referring further to the claim for indemnity by one Frederick B. Dawson, a British subject, and his family, for an alleged assault made by one Victor McCarthy and others in Sarpy County, Nebr., July 31, 1894, and the suggestions submitted by you in your communication of December 11, 1895, as to the advisability of criminally prosecuting the alleged assailants in the courts of this State, I have the honor to submit herewith for your consideration a report made to me by the county attorney of Sarpy County, the county in which the alleged offense was committed, together with the affidavits of certain citizens submitted to me at the same time, throwing some additional light upon this controversy.

I beg to submit, in addition to what is said by the county attorney in this communication, that after a consultation between the deputy attorney-general and the county attorney and myself respecting the advisability of prosecuting the alleged assailants in Sarpy County, I reached the conclusion that, owing to the present situation of all the parties connected with this transaction, it would be very difficult and with no reasonable hope of success to prosecute any of these parties at this time. I am of the opinion that this condition is largely the result of the action of the Dawsons, who claim to be the injured party. I feel warranted in saying that the courts of Sarpy County were accessible to them at the time the transaction occurred, and it was through their own action and a seeming reluctance to interest themselves in securing the arrest and punishment of these offenders that the matter has been allowed to lie dormant until the conditions are such that a criminal prosecution can not be had with any reasonable hope of conviction.

It is undoubtedly true that the McCartys were disposed to be lawless and had frequently violated the law in different respects, and that their acts were severely condemned by all classes of citizens, and the people generally would have looked with great favor upon a prosecution in this or any other case where the evidence was obtainable, with the desire of having them brought to justice for any violation of the law.

It can not, in my judgment, be assumed, upon any reasonable hypothesis, that either the courts or the citizens generally were opposed to the prosecution of these men. On the other hand, I am quite confident that the prosecution for this as well as other violations of law of which they had been guilty would have been looked upon with great favor, but by the actions of the Dawsons in seemingly condoning this offense and neglecting to take any steps looking to their prosecution the impression became prevalent that the transaction was trivial in its character and the result of a drunken brawl.

Victor McCarthy, the principal offender—and the only one against whom it seems at all probable a conviction could be had—has since been convicted of a much more serious offense and sentenced to the penitentiary for a period of fifteen years, but has escaped from the officers of the law and is a fugitive from justice. The whereabouts of two of the other parties is unknown. The prosecuting attorney of the county is firmly of the opinion that a conviction could not be secured as against the fourth one, whose participation he looks upon as being more that of a person trying to settle the disturbance than an act of participation therein.

The injured parties in this transaction not only had the remedy for their wrongs by prosecuting their assailants in the courts of the county where the transaction occurred, but they also had the right to bring a civil action against them for damages sustained and recover for any injury, damage, or loss suffered by them by this transaction.

While I am of the opinion, from the evidence submitted, that the assault was unprovoked and that the parties should have and could have been successfully prosecuted at the time, and that a civil action would lie for whatever damage there was, I am inclined to the view that at this time, and because of the subsequent actions of the injured parties, a prosecution of this character would serve no good purpose. The injury resulting from the assault has, in my judgment, been greatly magnified, and the claims for indemnity presented are so unreasonably high as to throw discredit upon the merits of the entire claim. At most, in my judgment, it was only a case of aggravated assault, with little, if any, permanent personal injury resulting therefrom.

While I do not wish to be understood as saying there is no merit in the contention of the claimants in this matter, I am clearly of the opinion that there has been a studied effort made to greatly magnify the injury done, and that the claims made are deserving of a most thorough and critical scrutiny, and that, if any, only a very moderate sum should be allowed, which will adequately compensate these parties for the personal injury or loss of property sustained by them on this occasion.

I am, sir, very truly, yours,

SILAS A. HOLCOMB, Governor.

Hon. RICHARD OLNEY,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments a bill (H. R. 7664) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

- A bill (S. 1656) for the relief of Stout, Hall & Bangs;
- A bill (S. 1929) for the relief of William H. Crook;
- A bill (S. 2594) granting an increase of pension to William A. Beckford;
- A bill (S. 2928) in relation to an extension of the routes of the Eckington and Soldiers' Home Railway Company and of the Belt Railway Company;
- A bill (S. 2324) to relieve John McCarthy from the charge of desertion;
- A bill (S. 1083) for the relief of Irwin Tucker, postmaster at Newport News, Va.; and
- A bill (S. 229) for the relief of Robert McGee.

WILLIAM B. ELLIS.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 2259) for the relief of William B. Ellis.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to so amend the military record of William B. Ellis, late captain of Company I, Seventy-ninth Indiana Volunteer Infantry, as to show him honorably discharged such service upon resignation on the 10th day of July, 1863, and that the said William B. Ellis be granted an honorable discharge as of such date.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object, and ask for an explanation of the bill.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, this is a measure a little out of the ordinary. This relief is not sought primarily by the party himself, but at the earnest solicitation of the living officers of the regiment in which he served as captain. An error was evidently made in the original charge which was preferred against this officer. He had resigned pending a charge which was to have been inquired into by a court-martial. Upon the indorsement of the resignation, under the acceptance, the colonel of the regiment had recorded that this officer's resignation was accepted for the good of the service and because he was a worthless officer, and it is to remove that stigma that this bill is introduced. The colonel himself, who is still living, has signed a petition addressed to Congress, joining with all the other living officers of the regiment, praying for the passage of this bill. In his statement, which is verified, the colonel says that Ellis was a courteous, efficient, and brave officer, but that he fell under influences that led him into dissipation for a time. He says that the circumstances surrounding the offense were quite aggravating, and that he made an indorsement upon the application, feeling at the time that it was deserved, but that this man was not to blame; that another officer, who was worthless, was the one who should have been held responsible. He says he has known Captain Ellis as a citizen and that his deportment has always been without reproach. He says that at the time he got into trouble the controlling influences were those of this associate officer, and that he thinks Captain Ellis has suffered intense mortification because of the unfortunate circumstances connected with his discharge from the Army. Then the colonel says:

I feel it is due to him and to myself, and I respectfully urge upon your honorable body that the record in the case of this officer be changed to an honorable discharge.

He is supported in this request by all the surviving officers of the regiment. It will be seen that the case is a little out of the ordinary, and this bill is intended simply to remove a stain which the colonel himself feels was inadvertently put upon Captain Ellis.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Will the gentleman accept an amendment providing that no pension shall be claimed by this man?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I should have no objection to that; but it is an unusual proposition. I have never known such an amendment to be offered in a case like this.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I shall object unless you accept that amendment.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I trust my friend will not insist upon it.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I must insist upon the amendment. If the gentleman accepts that I have no objection to his bill.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I will say to the gentleman from New York that, in reply to inquiry which I made directly of this officer, he stated to me that he had no thought of making any such application. It would look very much like a bargain, and that is why I object.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Speaker, I make no bargain. If the gentleman accepts my amendment I will not object to his bill, otherwise I must object.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Do you insist upon objecting unless that amendment is accepted?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I do.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Well, Mr. Speaker, I will accept the amendment.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I move to amend the amendment recommended by the committee by inserting in line 10, after the word "bounty," the word "pension."

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] to consent that that is to be considered as a part of the proposition before the House. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was read, as follows:

Add, after the word "date," the following: "Provided, That no pay, bounty, pension, or other allowances shall become due or payable by reason of the passage of this act."

The amendment was adopted.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. OVERSTREET, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

NATIONAL NEW HAVEN BANK.

Mr. SPERRY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill No. 1365. It is in relation to a certificate which has been issued by the Navy Department, which certificate is now in one of the banks of New Haven awaiting payment. There never has been sufficient money to pay the certificate, and the purpose of this bill is to authorize its payment.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to pay the National New Haven Bank of the State of Connecticut the sum of $3,519.15 out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. SPERRY. This bill was reported to the House by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Cox]. I ask the Clerk to read in connection with the bill the letter of the Auditor of the Treasury for the Navy Department which I send to the desk.

The letter was read, as follows:

THE TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF AUDITOR FOR THE NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., April 14, 1896.

SIR: In reply to your verbal inquiry in the matter of claim of the National Bank of New Haven for the amount of an approved voucher uttered February 28, 1877, by the Bureau of Construction and Repair of the Navy Department, in favor of John W. Griffiths, amounting to $3,519.15, I have the honor to state that in an examination of the records I do not find that payment of the above sum was made by settlement in this office.

Respectfully, yours,

E. N. BOWMAN, Acting Auditor.

Hon. N. D. SPERRY, M. C.,
House of Representatives.

Mr. SPERRY. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask to have read a letter from the Assistant Secretary of the Navy.

The letter was read, as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, April 16, 1896.

SIR: Referring to your personal inquiry at the Department this morning concerning the status of the claim of the National New Haven Bank of Connecticut, on account of money due J. W. Griffiths for extra work on the U. S. S. Enterprise in the sum of $3,519.15, I have the honor to inform you that the reason why said claim was not paid when demand was made therefor by said bank is that there was no appropriation available from which the amount thereof could be taken, and that although the claim is considered to be just, there is no appropriation from which it can now be paid.

For your further information in this connection, I inclose herewith a copy of a letter addressed to Hon. W. M. STEWART, Senate Committee on Claims, by the Department, under date of March 15, 1892.

Very respectfully,

W. MCADOO, Acting Secretary.

Hon. N. D. SPERRY,
House of Representatives.

Mr. SPERRY. Now, I should like to have the gentleman from Tennessee who reported the bill to the House make a statement concerning it.

Mr. COX. Has the report been read, Mr. Speaker? If not, I should like to have it read.

The report (by Mr. Cox) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1365) for the relief of National New Haven Bank, submit the following report:

This bill is the same as H. R. 1803, now pending in the House and previously reported by this committee with a favorable recommendation.

Your committee therefore recommend that this bill be substituted for said House bill, and that said House bill lie on the table.

Mr. COX. I think the bill is perfectly correct and ought to pass.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. SPERRY] called upon the gentleman from Tennessee to explain this bill. The gentleman says he is satisfied with the bill, but that does not tell the House anything about it. I should like to hear an explanation.

Mr. COX. My attention was drawn to another matter and I supposed that the gentleman in charge of the bill had explained it.

Mr. SPERRY. Mr. Speaker, the explanation of the bill is this:

A few years ago when the sloop Enterprise was built there was an adjustment of the account made by the Navy Department. After that adjustment a certificate was issued in triplicate by the Navy Department to Mr. Griffiths in final settlement of his claim. That settlement amounted to $3,519.15. A certificate was given for that sum, but when the certificate was presented at the proper Bureau for payment it was found that there was not sufficient money to meet it. The holder of the certificate then took it to one of the banks and made a note and lodged the certificate with the bank as collateral security. When the note became due it was not paid, and the bank has been carrying the certificate ever since. This bill has passed the Senate once or twice, but has failed to come up in the House, and now, inasmuch as that certificate, which has the indorsement of the Secretary of the Navy and of the Auditor of the Treasury Department for the Navy, is still unpaid, I ask that it may be met by the passage of this bill. That is all there is of this case. It is a plain, simple proposition, to meet an undisputed Government indebtedness.

Mr. DINGLEY. I did not hear the letters read, owing to the confusion in the Hall, but, as I understand, the letter of the Treasury official states that this amount is due to the owner of the certificate.

Mr. SPERRY. Yes.

Mr. DINGLEY. And this New Haven bank holds the certificate as collateral on a loan?

Mr. SPERRY. Yes, sir.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, until the bill shall be put in such shape as to show what this money is to be paid for, I shall have to object. I will never allow a bill to go through this House, if I can prevent it, directing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay an amount of money to a given party without specifying the object for which the money is to be paid.

Mr. SPERRY. It does specify.

Mr. LOUD. No. It simply directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay so much money.

Mr. SPERRY. I think it specifies.

Mr. LOUD. Let us have the bill read again.

The bill was again read.

Mr. LOUD. Now, Mr. Speaker, until the bill is amended as I have indicated, I must object.

Mr. SPERRY. I have no objection to the bill being amended so as to show what the money is to be paid for.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will have to present his amendment.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, does not the report show the number of the certificate which the bank holds? The bill ought to be amended, I think, so as to show that the money is to be paid on that certificate.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Connecticut desire to amend his bill? The gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] objects unless an amendment is made.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, the number of that certificate is in the papers, and it probably ought to be inserted in the bill. I now ask unanimous consent, inasmuch as I know that this claim is absolutely right, that the bill go over until to-morrow morning.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that this bill go over until to-morrow after the reading of the Journal. There is already one special order of that sort pending.

Mr. KEM. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. SPERRY. Mr. Speaker, is it understood that my bill goes over until to-morrow morning?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. SPERRY. Then I make that motion.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not in order. The regular order is called for by the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. SPERRY. I understood that the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Cox] was that the bill should go over until to-morrow morning.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman from Nebraska then called for the regular order.

REGULATION OF MARRIAGES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, on the last District day—

Mr. KEM. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the call for the regular order.

Mr. MAHON. I renew it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. BABCOCK. When the House adjourned two weeks ago to-day, there was pending Senate bill No. 1904, for the regulation of marriages in the District of Columbia, upon which the previous question had been demanded. There being no quorum present on that vote, the House adjourned. I now renew the demand for the previous question on that bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the Senate bill ought to be read again.

Mr. DOCKERY. That is correct.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 1904) to regulate marriages in the District of Columbia.

The bill was read at length.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will also report the amendments recommended by the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The amendments were read at length.

The SPEAKER. There were also other amendments presented by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HULICK].

Mr. BABCOCK. I understood the amendments were cut off by the demand for the previous question. I do not understand that there were any pending amendments except the committee amendments.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that they are pending.

Mr. PICKLER. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BABCOCK. Certainly; I yield to the gentleman for a moment.

Mr. PICKLER. How much time does the gentleman desire during the day for the District business?

Mr. BABCOCK. In answer to the gentleman, I will say that it will take but a very short time unless there shall be unnecessary discussion. This bill has been thoroughly discussed already. The previous question has been demanded, and it can be disposed of in five minutes, I think.

Mr. PICKLER. I understood the gentleman to say a short time ago in conversation that an hour or an hour and a half, he thought, would be sufficient.

Mr. BABCOCK. I do not think we can occupy that much time.

Mr. PICKLER. I do not want to antagonize the District, but

I think we have the right of way with the pension bill, and if at the expiration of two hours the business is not disposed of I shall feel compelled to ask the House to proceed with the consideration of that bill under the five-minute rule.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman gives notice.

Mr. MAHON. Does this committee not have the right of way for the further consideration of the pension bill without the vote of the House even?

The SPEAKER. The District of Columbia has the right of way to-day.

Mr. MAHON. Without a vote of the House?

The SPEAKER. Without a vote of the House.

Mr. GROSVENOR. But the House can vote down that right of way, if it so desires.

Mr. PICKLER. I give notice that I will ask the House to consider the pension bill after two hours, unless the Committee on the District of Columbia sooner disposes of this business.

The SPEAKER. The amendments proposed by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HULICK] will be read.

The amendments were read at length.

Mr. BABCOCK. Those are not committee amendments. The committee considered and refused to adopt them, and they ought to be defeated.

The previous question was ordered, under the operation of which the amendments reported from the committee were adopted.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry, Is a motion to recommit now in order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not until after the bill has passed to its engrossment and third reading.

The question recurred on the amendments proposed by Mr. HULICK.

The amendments were rejected.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Will a motion to recommit be in order now?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WALSH] has indicated an intention of making that motion. The motion is now in order.

Mr. WALSH. I move to recommit this bill to the Committee on the District of Columbia. May I make a statement at this time?

The SPEAKER. It would not be in order.

Mr. WALSH. The matter is not now debatable?

The SPEAKER. It is not debatable, the previous question having been ordered.

The question being taken on the motion to recommit, there were (on a division demanded by Mr. WALSH)—ayes 5, noes 46.

So the motion was rejected.

The bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. BABCOCK, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

BANKRUPTCY.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say to the House that to-morrow, after the action upon the pension bill, I shall ask the authority of the House to bring up the general bankruptcy bill. Many gentlemen have asked the question, and I desire to give notice of that now.

CAPITAL RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I call up for consideration the bill (S. 888) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Capital Railway Company," approved March 2, 1895.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act to incorporate the Capital Railway Company," approved March 2, 1895, be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out in the first section all after the words "for a common seal," to the end of the section, and inserting the following: "Said corporation is hereby authorized to construct and lay down and complete a single or double track street railway in the District of Columbia, and run cars thereon for carrying passengers by and along the following route: Beginning at a point on the District line near the Potomac River southeast of Shepherd's Ferry, thence by such route as shall be approved by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to the south side of the Eastern Branch or Anacostia River at the Navy-Yard Bridge; thence across said bridge to Eleventh street east; thence north on Eleventh street east to M street south; thence west on M street to a point to be located by the District Commissioners near Eighth street east, connecting with the lines of the Capital Traction Company, and returning over the same route to the point of beginning. Also, beginning at the eastern end of the Navy-Yard Bridge, easterly along Monroe and Harrison streets and Good Hope road, and from Good Hope road to the District line, over such route as the District Commissioners shall approve, and returning over the same route to the point of beginning: Provided, That within the city of Washington a double-track railway shall be constructed.

SEC. 2. That the motive power to be used on the lines in this act specified shall be the underground electric system within the city of Washington and the overhead trolley system outside the city of Washington. For crossing the Navy-Yard Bridge the said company may, in the discretion of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, use either horse power or the underground electric system to propel its cars; and the said company shall have the privilege of carrying an electric current across the said Navy-Yard Bridge in such manner as the said Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall prescribe.

SEC. 3. That the Capital Railway Company and the Capital Traction Company are hereby required to issue free transfers at the point of intersection of their respective lines, so that for the payment of one fare a passenger on either road shall have the privilege of riding over the lines of both.

SEC. 4. That the portion of the company's route from Congress or Pencote Heights to Shepherds Landing shall be completed within four years from the date of the passage of this act.

SEC. 5. That Congress reserves the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, there are certain committee amendments.

The Clerk read from the report of the Committee on the District of Columbia, as follows:

The committee think the Senate bill should be amended as follows:

After the word "Company," in line 21, section 1, page 2, of the bill, add the words "also continuing from said Eleventh and M streets, north of Eleventh street to the south building line of A street south."

The object of this amendment is to make the lines of the company connect with the Metropolitan Railway Company.

A further amendment should be made to the Senate bill as follows:

At the end of section 1 add the following words: "Provided, That the line of said railway company shall be commenced within three months and completed within two years from date of the passage of this act, with the exception mentioned in section 4 of this bill."

And a further amendment as follows:

"After the word 'Company,' in line 1, section 3, on page 3, add the words 'the Metropolitan Railroad Company.'"

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I want to make a statement about this bill. I will yield to the gentleman from Iowa then.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] is recognized.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, this bill is designed to be an amendment to a charter which was granted to this railroad company by the Fifty-third Congress. The line will run about as follows: Beginning at Congress Heights, beyond the Eastern Branch, beyond the village of Anacostia, it then comes down through the village of Anacostia and crosses the Anacostia Bridge, comes up to the navy-yard, and there connects with the line of the Capital Traction Company—that is, the Washington and Georgetown Railroad Company. Then from Eleventh street, one or two blocks beyond the navy-yard, there is a branch to run up to Lincoln Park and there connect with the line of the Metropolitan Railroad Company.

The bill provides that there shall be a free transfer with both these roads at those points.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the line goes beyond Congress Heights to what is called Shepherds Landing, which is some 3 or 4 miles beyond the asylum, or beyond Congress Heights, which are just beyond the asylum, as I understand their location. It is also intended that from near Congress Heights a branch shall run up in the neighborhood of what is known as Overlook Inn. I presume some gentlemen, or all, know where that point is.

There is a great demand, Mr. Speaker, for this road, if we take the testimony of the citizens of Anacostia, who are now almost without railroad facilities and accommodations.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I desire to ask if this discretion which is vested in the Commissioners, on page 2, line 14—

Thence by such route as shall be approved by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to the south side of the Eastern Branch or Anacostia River at the Navy-Yard Bridge—relates to any portion of the line which is in the city proper?

Mr. RICHARDSON. None of it at all. It is outside of the city, as I understand it.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I will ask the same question with reference to the discretion lodged in the Commissioners, on page 2, in lines 24, 25, 26, 27, and 28:

Also beginning at the eastern end of the Navy-Yard Bridge, easterly along Monroe and Harrison streets and Good Hope road, and from Good Hope road to the District line, over such route as the District Commissioners shall approve, and returning over the same route to the point of beginning.

Is any portion of that route in the city?

Mr. RICHARDSON. No; that is all away beyond the Eastern Branch.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. And the portions of the line that extend within the city are limited?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. And no discretion is given to the Commissioners as to that part?

Mr. RICHARDSON. None at all. The object is, as I was about to remark, to afford accommodations for the thriving village of Anacostia, which now contains five or six thousand people, who are almost without street-railroad facilities. My attention has also been called to the fact that there is a large settlement beyond Anacostia, known as Congress Heights, and there are some other villages beyond, which are utterly without railroad facilities. Also the Government lunatic asylum, St. Elizabeth's, on the edge of Anacostia, beyond the river, is without railroad facilities. I have been informed that there are twenty-six or twenty-seven hundred inmates, including patients and attendants.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Is this road all on the east side of the Capitol—in the eastern side of the city?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes. I will state that these people at the lunatic asylum have no railroad facilities into town. The little Anacostia road stops at the foot of the hill, something like a quarter of a mile or more this side of the asylum, so that there is no accommodation whatever to the people there and to the persons who have to visit that institution. The object is to afford more rapid transit to that neighborhood and to accommodate the people in that locality. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE] asked me about the limits in this city. The terminus in this city will be the navy-yard, in one case, and Lincoln Park, on Eleventh street, in the other, so that the road does not come into the populous part of the city. But it is provided that where that road connects with the Washington and Georgetown, or the Capital Traction Company, as it is now called, and the Metropolitan road, at the navy-yard and at Lincoln Park, there shall be free transfers with both roads, so that passengers desiring to come in from Anacostia and to go thence may have the benefit of one fare only.

Now, I believe that is all. The road is demanded, Mr. Speaker, by hundreds of people. The room of the Committee on the District of Columbia has been flooded time and time again by people who came in person, and a large number sent petitions urging this accommodation. It is a Senate bill, which has already passed the Senate, and we simply amend it with the small amendments to which I have called attention.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Tennessee has omitted to say that which perhaps he might have said, that there is no Capital Railway Company having an existing charter now. It is attempted by an amendment to revive a forfeited charter.

Mr. RICHARDSON. No; the gentleman is mistaken in that.

Mr. HEPBURN. If the gentleman will refer to the act of March 2, 1895, which was an act to incorporate the Capital Railway Company, he will find that there are two conditions of forfeiture in that bill. One requires that the road shall be begun within one year. That year expired on the 2d day of last March. The other requires that there shall be a report made to Congress containing the various matters referred to in that section. Inquiry shows that up to this time, although that report was due on the 1st day of February last, no such report has been made; and the provision of the section declares a failure to be a forfeiture of the charter. So that it is safe to say that, without a legislative recognition of the present existence of this charter, it has no existence.

Now, I am not disposed to oppose the general purpose of this bill. I believe that that portion of the District named by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] ought to be accommodated; but there ought to be some guaranty, Mr. Speaker, that when we authorize this company to act as a corporation it will do something. They were required to begin their work within a year, and to complete it within two years. Now, I am perfectly willing, if it is amended, to allow it to pass, but they ought to be required to begin their work at once and to complete their work in the District within a year.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment? If he will notice, the House has provided an amendment to the Senate bill which requires them to begin work in three months.

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes, sir; and to complete it within two years?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes. They have two years now.

Mr. HEPBURN. They have not a minute. They have no charter, and without the passage of this act the gentleman knows they can not now move a wheel or put a spade in the ground.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman will pardon me a moment. They had three years in which to complete it, and that is what I meant by saying that they still have two years more.

Mr. HEPBURN. But they have no right to complete it unless they began within a year.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not know how much work they have done.

Mr. HEPBURN. Their charter is forfeited on both the grounds, as I claim.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I would suggest to the gentleman that, however that may be, technically considered, the great demand for the road ought to influence this House to grant them the charter.

Mr. HEPBURN. I am not going to combat that if the gentleman will submit to proper amendments.

Mr. RICHARDSON. What amendments does the gentleman suggest?

Mr. HEPBURN. I suggest two amendments. The first one is that the road, after reaching Eighth street, by way of M, should continue on Eighth street to East Capitol street. That gives connection with both roads, and does away with the necessity of it on Eleventh street.

Mr. RICHARDSON. You want it to run on Eighth street?

Mr. HEPBURN. Let it continue on Eighth street.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Instead of Eleventh?

Mr. HEPBURN. Instead of Eleventh.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Well?

Mr. HEPBURN. I am not as solicitous about that as I am about the time of completion. The experience of this committee as to the building of roads in this city shows that it is entirely practicable within six months instead of a year or two years; and if they are in good faith I think they will accept this amendment as to the time. The other I am not at all particular about.

Mr. RICHARDSON. One moment there. I think the traction company is on Eighth street, and they can not run two sets of tracks on that street.

Mr. HEPBURN. It is on Eighth street to Pennsylvania avenue.

Mr. RICHARDSON. They can not occupy the same street.

Mr. HEPBURN. Their charter provides for the use of the tracks of roads with which their line coincides.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The Capital Traction Company or the Washington and Georgetown road have their lines there.

Now, then, as to the other amendment, I want to say that, while I do not know myself, I am informed by a note which I have just received that work has begun on the road. They have been at work on the road. I do not know how much they have done. I want to say this in justice to the gentleman—

Mr. HEPBURN. Well, the gentleman knows very well that nothing practically has been done. They may have attempted in some surreptitious way to hold their charter, but they have not made the report they are required to make. A provision in the bill declares that a failure to make that report works a forfeiture, and that report has not been made.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I am informed by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS] that they have made a report and that a deposit has been made.

Mr. HEPBURN. I got it from the Clerk only a moment ago. I made the inquiry whether that report to Congress had been made.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Well, the gentleman from Mississippi sitting near me has that information, but I do not know that it is reliable.

Mr. HEPBURN. Now, I am not going to be tenacious about this, if the gentleman will accept an amendment requiring the completion of the work in one year. I know, and the gentleman knows, that if the company are in good faith they can do it in that time.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I understand the gentleman's proposition to be that they be required to complete it in one year instead of in two years, as proposed by the committee?

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Well, I do not object to that, because I have never known Congress to forfeit a charter where the company went to work in earnest, thus giving evidence of its intention in good faith to complete its road.

Mr. HEPBURN. I think Congress has shown that in the case of the Metropolitan Company. Congress began seven years ago to force them to do what they have not yet completed.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Their time has not yet expired. I do not object to the gentleman's amendment, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. HEPBURN. In the amendment recommended by the committee, in section 1, line 39, I move to strike out "two," before "years," and to insert "one;" and also to strike out the letter "s" in the word "years."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HEPBURN. Now, in section 4 there is a limitation of four years. Certainly the gentleman does not want to give any railway company four years in which to complete its road. In view of the existing demand for rapid transit, I think the limitation ought to be made two years.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not know that I shall object to that amendment, but I want to say to the gentleman that that part of the line begins at Congress or Pencote Heights, which is something like a mile beyond Anacostia, and from that point on to the river at Shepherd's Landing the route, as I understand, runs through the woods, or at least through an entirely unimproved region, so that there is no demand for the early completion of that part of the road.

Mr. HEPBURN. Well, suppose we strike out that section.

Mr. RICHARDSON. But the company desire the right to build that line. Shepherd's Landing is an objective point on the river which they desire to reach, and which I think ought to be reached.

Mr. HEPBURN. Then, Mr. Speaker, in section 4, line 8, I move to strike out the word "four," before "years," and insert "two."

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendments recommended by the committee as amended were adopted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The attention of the Chair is called to the fact that in line 16, page 2, of the engrossed bill, the word "the" is repeated.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I ask unanimous consent that one "the" be stricken out.

There was no objection.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. RICHARDSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and also moved to lay that motion on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I believe the Committee on the District of Columbia has no further business to bring before the House to-day.

REFERENCE OF A BILL.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Speaker, I am instructed by the Committee on Ways and Means to ask that the bill H. R. 6639 be referred back to the committee.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

COL. PHILLIP KIRSCHNER.

Mr. CORLISS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the desk. It will take but a few minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. PICKLER] does not wish to be recognized, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. PICKLER (to Mr. CORLISS). Is this a private bill?

Mr. CORLISS. It is, but not one that ought to be considered at a Friday night session.

Mr. PICKLER. I will withhold the demand for the regular order for a few minutes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized and directed to reimburse and pay to Col. Phillip Kirschner the sum of $388.52, with interest thereon from August 6, 1861, for money paid by him as a commissioned officer in the Army for the services of a band for the Sixteenth Regiment of Ohio Infantry Volunteers during the war, on proper proof of the payment of the said sum by said Kirschner duly submitted to and approved by the auditing or accounting officer of the Treasury, which sum is hereby appropriated for the purpose out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

An amendment recommended by the committee was read, as follows:

Strike out lines 5 and 6, and the words "and sixty-six," in line 7, and substitute therefor "$337.32." Strike out the letter "c" in "Kirschner."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object, and ask for an explanation.

Mr. CORLISS. It will appear from the report in this case, which was made by unanimous consent, that under the proclamation by the President in April, 1861, commissioned officers were authorized to engage bands for the Army, and this commissioned officer engaged a band for the three months' service, in connection with other officers, and made a contract for that period. The band served during the three months. This commissioned officer remained in the service, but the band were mustered out. They did not, however, receive from the Government the full contract price.

Several years afterwards Colonel Kirschner was compelled to pay his part of the balance. There was an act of Congress passed at the time authorizing the engagement of bands by commissioned officers and another act directing the Treasury Department to pay the amount contracted for. That act was afterwards repealed and the engagement of the bands was authorized to be made in the regular way. This transaction occurred early in the war, in April, 1861. This commissioned officer served through the war and from a gunshot wound lost his sight. Three years after he was mustered out a judgment was claimed against him for this money by another commissioned officer who had been compelled to pay it under a judgment. Colonel Kirschner was compelled to pay his portion. At that time he was able to pay it, but later he became blind, and now he is blind and penniless except for the pension that he receives, and in his helpless condition, at 75 years of age, he asks to be repaid the money which he was compelled to pay for this purpose by the judgment of a court.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Speaker, I think I will be compelled to demand the regular order.

Mr. CORLISS. This bill ought to pass.

Mr. PICKLER. This bill will evidently consume considerable time—

Mr. CORLISS. I think not. There is no possible question about the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Dakota demands the regular order, which is equivalent to an objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of the pension bill.

Mr. HENDERSON. Pending that, I wish to submit a privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Rules, having had under consideration Resolution No. 235, report back the accompanying resolution as a substitute, with the recommendation that the substitute be adopted:

Resolved, That on the passage of this resolution the consideration of the bill H. R. 8271, a bill relating to pensions, shall be resumed and considered under the five-minute rule for one hour and a half, when it, with any amendments that may be adopted, shall be reported favorably to the House, the previous question shall be considered as ordered upon the bill and said amendments to the passage of said bill, and on Tuesday, April 28, 1896, immediately after the reading of the Journal, the vote shall be taken on the passage of said bill.

Mr. HENDERSON. I reserve my remarks until I hear from any gentleman who may desire to oppose the resolution. If no one desires to take the floor, I shall ask the previous question on the report.

Mr. CRISP. That will allow debate afterwards.

Mr. MILES. Mr. Speaker, before the question is taken, I desire to submit an inquiry. I was unable to ascertain from the reading of this report exactly what it proposes. I would like to ask whether this rule will render it possible to offer any amendments to the bill?

The SPEAKER. The rule will be read again for the information of the House.

The rule proposed by the Committee on Rules was again reported.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. CRISP. Does the gentleman desire to say anything about the rule—to make any explanation of it?

Mr. HENDERSON. I will reserve my remarks. I yield a few moments to my friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], who wishes to make a statement to the House.

Mr. CANNON. I do not wish to make any remarks upon the proposed rule, but I suppose that about 2 o'clock we will get a report from the Senate on the sundry civil bill. I would be glad when it comes over to have the committee rise, if we go into Committee of the Whole on the pension bill, and let me dispose of the sundry civil bill by sending the amendments of the Senate to conference. I ask this because I am compelled to be absent from the House to-morrow.

Mr. HENDERSON. Does the gentleman think it will involve any debate?

Mr. CANNON. I think not. If it does, however, it would not interfere with the hour and a half set apart by this rule, because under the order that time would be occupied anyhow. I suppose it would be in order to make that arrangement.

Mr. HENDERSON. I have no objection to it.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I would like to ask a question before the vote is taken on the proposed resolution. Why not have the vote this afternoon, instead of putting it off until to-morrow?

Mr. HENDERSON. Because there are a number of gentlemen, members of the House, who are compelled to be absent this afternoon and who wish to vote on this question. The vote was put off until to-morrow in order to accommodate them. This is General Grant's birthday, and a number of orators have been compelled to go abroad on this occasion. We are trying to accommodate them.

I reserve my time, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, if I can get the attention of the House for a moment, I would be glad that members should understand before they vote on this order exactly what it means.

There are occasions when a right is pretendedly given and yet substantially none is granted. This is one of those occasions. This order is remarkable for appearing to do one thing and, in fact, doing another.

Now, I take it for granted that there are numbers of gentlemen in this House who desire to offer amendments to the pending bill. There may be gentlemen in this House who fancy that upon the adoption of this order their right to offer amendments will be retained. They are mistaken. This order provides for one hour and a half to be devoted to the consideration of the bill under the five-minute rule. That means that amendments are in order. Now, under the rules of the House, when amendments are in order, four amendments may be pending at one time—an amendment to the text, an amendment to that amendment, a substitute, and an amendment to the substitute. When you adopt this order, therefore, all these amendments may be offered and recognized by the Chair as pending amendments. Now, then, you have got one and one-half hours under the five-minute rule for consideration of amendments and for debate. The first amendment probably would be to strike out the first section of the bill, which has been assailed on both sides of the House. An hour and a half is to be used in debate. It is very easy to use all of that time under the five-minute rule in debating the first section, and when the hour and a half expires the committee must rise and report to the House—what? Not the four amendments that are pending in Committee of the Whole, but report to the House only such amendments as have been adopted by the committee.

No amendment has been adopted by the committee, because the hour and a half was used in debating the first amendment; so that when you get in the House the question is, Shall the bill without amendment pass? That is all there is to it. Every order of this kind that has been drawn heretofore, I think—I can not be positive, but that is my recollection—provided that when the time for consideration expired the committee should rise, report the bill to the House, and the House should vote on pending amendments—amendments that were pending in the committee—so that there might in fact be some right to amend. But if you adopt this order then you practically say that no amendment shall be voted upon by the House.

If there are members here who desire to amend this bill, the choice is presented to them here and now. If you want to amend this bill, you must vote down this order. If you want to pass this bill without amendment, then you vote up this order.

So that the matter may be clearly understood, so that no man can go to his constituents and say, "I voted for this bill because I had no opportunity to offer an amendment; I wanted to amend it, but I could not," I call attention to the fact that if a majority of this House desire to amend the bill the way to do it is to vote down this rule and let the bill be considered in the ordinary course of business. There have been three days devoted to general debate upon the bill. Nearly every gentleman who has spoken has announced his dissatisfaction with the bill and his desire to improve it, and yet you are allowed one hour and a half to consider it under the five-minute rule, to consider it in such a way that practically you must take the bill without amendment. If the majority want to do that, of course they have the power to do it.

I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. HENDERSON. I yield to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY].

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, this rule seems to be almost a literal copy of the rule presented by the Committee on Rules when the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] was Speaker of the House, on the passage of the Wilson tariff bill in the House. The time was a little longer, but as to the principle involved substantially the same.

Mr. CRISP. Will my friend be kind enough to turn to that order, and see if it does not provide for a vote on "pending amendments"?

Mr. DINGLEY. I have not the order before me, but I remember substantially what it was. The gentleman is very well aware that there could have been but one amendment pending.

Mr. CRISP. Four amendments.

Mr. DINGLEY. You can not have several amendments pending the same time.

Mr. CRISP. Four amendments might be pending.

Mr. DINGLEY. It must be an amendment, or an amendment to the amendment, or a substitute, or an amendment to the substitute. It is practically but one amendment.

Mr. CRISP. Four. The gentleman is not candid about that.

Mr. DINGLEY. Then again, as a matter of fact, the limitation of debate is entirely within the control of the committee on each of these amendments. A motion may be made in the committee, at any moment, to close the debate on a pending amendment or on a pending section. There is no difficulty about that at all.

It seems to me that after we have spent ever since last Tuesday debating this bill, the amendments that have been suggested having been largely amendments of form and not of serious moment, an hour and a half will be sufficient time to consider the bill for amendment and reach a conclusion in this matter. It seems to me that we are now so near the close of this session, if we expect to get legislation in this matter in the Senate, that we ought to complete this bill to-day, and not drag it along further. I hope the rule will be adopted.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I want action upon this bill. We have had four and one-half days' general debate upon it. If gentlemen still desire to spend their time in talking, the hour and a half may be lost. For my part, I am willing to have a rule that would bring us to a vote at once upon the bill. I do not disguise that, and I will tell you why. This bill has had careful consideration and reconsideration in the committee appointed by the House for that purpose. It has been fully discussed, and as the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] has stated, nothing of a substantial or original character has been suggested in respect to it in general debate.

But I want another thing. I want a bill to pass this House that will pass through two other Houses, the Senate and the White House, and if the friends of the soldier mean business they ought to sustain the proposition now pending before the House.

We know perfectly well that there are other things that we should like to have in the way of pension legislation. But this bill as it stands carries out the declarations of General Lawler, the late commander in chief of the Grand Army of the Republic, and one of the truest friends of the old soldier. In his report to the great Louisville gathering he said that the soldiers were not asking for new legislation, but they wanted an honest interpretation and genuine administration of the laws now upon the statute books. The great purpose of the pending bill is to give force and effect to the recommendations of General Lawler, which were seconded in the resolutions of the Grand Army of the Republic, as officially adopted.

Now, I make no disguise about the fact. The purpose of this rule is to bring us to a vote on this bill. If there is any necessary amendment, important amendment, that in the judgment of this House should be put upon the bill, the hour and a half will afford ample time to do it. After the scope the debate has taken, I am sure that any amendment that may be offered will be understood at once, and we can come to a vote at once. But I will say for my own part, while I have many additional thoughts that could be added to the bill, I prefer, for the safety of legislation, to have this go forward at once. Now, it is important in respect to the matter of time. We have an intimation made from the other end of the Capitol that adjournment may be had by the 18th of next month, and we are at the threshold of that month. In my anxiety for this legislation, I was willing that the bankruptcy bill should give way in order that it might be considered in time to secure its passage into law. We have other matters that are pressing on us for consideration—important bills from the Committee on Labor and bills from the Committee on Immigration—and if we want to reach these matters so that the Senate shall have time to attend to them, I think the time for talk has passed and the time for action has arrived. [Applause on the Republican side.] I reserve the balance of my time, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. CRISP. One word, Mr. Speaker. Gentlemen will observe, and my friend from Iowa does not deny it, that the purpose of this resolution is exactly what I have said—to destroy the right of amendment. It is now fifteen minutes to 2 o'clock. You do not propose in this order to have a vote this afternoon. Oh, no! You want a vote on it to-morrow. Why can we not have the three hours and fifteen minutes from now until the usual hour of adjournment for amendments? If there was any real desire to have the right of amendment, why not let this run until 5 o'clock? That would give us three hours and fifteen minutes. But I will tell you the reason why. The reason is, the leaders of this House have decided that this bill must pass, and nothing else.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Invalid Pensions devoted days and days, as I am told, to the consideration of a pension bill. They brought in a bill which in their judgment was a proper bill to pass, but they were not allowed to pass it. Those gentlemen who dictate the business of this House, those gentlemen who manage the business of the House, those gentlemen who protect this majority of 150 against itself, got together and made this bill. This bill was not made by the Committee on Invalid Pensions. It was made by the gentlemen who manage the House out in the Speaker's room; and then the Committee on Invalid Pensions was informed, "You take this bill or you take nothing." That, at least, is what we understand on this side. Certainly this is not the bill that the Committee on Invalid Pensions reported. And now, in order to get it through—in order to protect the Republican majority of 150 against itself—the gentlemen who know better what you ought to do than you know yourselves furnish you a rule by which you must either do what they decide or you shall do nothing. If, under these circumstances, you want this rule, you are welcome to it. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HENDERSON. How much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has fifteen minutes remaining.

Mr. HENDERSON. I want to say a word in reply to this voice that comes from the solemn Star Chamber of the past [laughter on the Republican side], the Star Chamber from whence rules clad in steel have driven bills through this House that never had opportunity for amendment in the Committee of the Whole. I have made no concealment. The gentleman appeals for an opportunity to perfect this bill. I take it in the interest of the old soldiers, and in the same interest I ask for action here and now. He makes it appear from his remarks, as some other gentlemen have done in the general debate, that this bill does not reflect the views of the Committee on Invalid Pensions. The gentleman says that other gentlemen in this House, whose hearts are touched with the inspiration that gathers around the interests of the old soldiers, have lent their earnest counsel in respect to this bill. I say thus far that is true. There is not a man on this side of the Chamber—and I hope there are several on that, who have felt an interest in the matter—but has given the benefit of his counsel to perfect a bill that could be put upon the statute books. Can the voice of that ancient Star Chamber say as much for his people in the Committees on Rules of which he was a member? [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, as one of that 150 majority in the House, referred to by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] and as a member of the House, I am very heartily in favor of the adoption of this resolution, and briefly for the following reasons: I was in the Fifty-first Congress and voted for the act of 1890 that was construed by the then Administration. It wrote the names of 400,000 soldiers, their widows and orphans, upon the pension rolls or increased their pensions. The present Administration came in and at one stroke of the pen 20,000 pensioners under the act of 1890 were suspended and the remainder were put in fear—intimidated, as everybody knows, in relation to their just pensions and claims. The last Congress began and expired and gave no relief. The present Administration, touching the act of 1890, unsettled the construction of that law under which these men were pensioned—a construction ratified by three sessions of Congress.

Now, with Cleveland for President, under whose Administration this action was had, the present bill proposes to correct that faulty administration by legislation. Therefore I am for it. This bill goes as far as I believe the Senate and Grover Cleveland will go. I fear, perchance, that it goes further than they will go; and I will not refuse this meed of justice, which will place at rest the three hundred and odd thousand soldiers under the act of 1890 that are on the pension roll. I will not hesitate to go this far because I can not do complete justice. Therefore, as a member of this House, I am for the bill. As it stands it is the best we can do now. Later on, with full power, we will do better.

Mr. HENDERSON. How much time have I remaining, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has eleven minutes.

Mr. HENDERSON. I reserve it.

Mr. CRISP. How much time remains on this side, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia also has eleven minutes.

Mr. CRISP. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa, Mr. HEPBURN.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that this rule ought to be adopted. If there is any question in the world upon which a Republican House can be trusted it is the question of pensions [applause], and I believe the Republican majority here is able to take care of this matter without the interference of the Committee on Rules. I doubt the good faith of some gentlemen with regard to this bill. I do not believe that this rule is in the interest of the old soldier. I believe that there ought to be amendments upon this bill. I believe there ought to be enlargements—perhaps not of the pension roll or of the classes, but I believe there ought to be enlargements made so as to compel construction of the pension statutes in the interest of the old soldier. There is no guaranty that those amendments can be placed upon this bill if there is a limitation as to the time for consideration. There are several amendments which gentlemen desire to offer, amendments that will require more or less discussion in general debate.

We have already occupied three days upon this bill, but without one moment for amendment.

Now, let us have an opportunity to perfect the bill. The bugaboo which gentlemen introduce as to what the Senate will probably do and as to what the President will do ought not to deter us. Let us have such a bill leave this Chamber as will meet the approval of Republicans. [Applause.] That is our duty. Let us have such a bill as coincides with our ideas of the interpretation that should be given to the statutes and our views of what are the old soldiers' rights in the premises. If there are other people who can thwart that legislation, let the responsibility rest where it ought to rest. Let us not assume that responsibility because it is feared that those other people may thwart our legislation. I do not want to be a participant, either with the Executive or with the Senate, in legislation hostile to the old soldier or in refusing him that legislation which he ought to have, and I am a participant when, guided or influenced by unfounded fears or by real fears, I refuse to do the whole measure of my duty. A gentleman has said that our action should comport with the opinion of a distinguished citizen of the United States who said upon an occasion that no further pension legislation was necessary.

Mr. Speaker, when did it become necessary that the House of Representatives should abdicate its powers, or that the Republican majority here should abdicate its powers, because some private individual has expressed an opinion as to the limits to which we should go? We are not relieved of our responsibility because General Lawler or any other man has expressed an opinion on this subject. It is merely the opinion of one of the twelve or thirteen million voters in the United States. It does not relieve us from the responsibilities or the obligations of duty. I want to see this rule voted down. I want to see ample opportunity given to amend this bill intelligently and after proper discussion under the five-minute rule, and when it is amended to satisfy the Republican majority let us send it on its way, undeterred by fear as to what may be the action of other persons or of other bodies. [Applause.] I yield the remainder of my time.

Mr. HENDERSON. Does the gentleman from Georgia desire to use any further time?

Mr. CRISP. I think not.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 70, noes 66.

Mr. HEPBURN and Mr. CRISP called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 118, nays 89, not voting 147; as follows:

So the resolution was adopted.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I desire to know whether the gentleman from New Jersey, Mr. FOWLER, is recorded as voting, because it may determine my action in this matter.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. FOWLER] is not recorded.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. The gentleman from New Jersey and I agreed to pair upon this bill. For fear he may have understood that the pair applied to this motion, I withdraw my vote, which I have cast in the negative, and am willing that the pair be regarded as applying to this question.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CANNON. I ask unanimous consent that the sundry civil appropriation bill, returned from the Senate with amendments, be taken from the Speaker's table, and that the House nonconcur in the amendments and ask a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] asks unanimous consent to take up House bill 7664—the sundry civil appropriation bill—disagree to the amendments of the Senate, and ask for a conference. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. Without objection, the bill and amendments will be printed. The Chair appoints as conferees on the part of the House the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. CANNON, the gentleman from Nebraska, Mr. HAINER, and the gentleman from Texas, Mr. SAYERS.

PENSIONS.

The SPEAKER. In pursuance of the order just adopted, the House will now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union upon House bill 8271, relating to pensions.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole (Mr. PAYNE in the chair), and resumed the consideration of House bill No. 8271.

The order of the House relative to the consideration of the bill in Committee of the Whole under the five-minute rule was read. The first section of the bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That no person otherwise entitled to a pension by virtue of any law of the United States shall be disqualified from receiving the same by reason of any prior service in the Confederate army or navy during the war of the rebellion, nor shall the widow, children, or dependent relatives of such person be deprived of a right to pension by reason of such service; Provided, That no pension shall be granted by virtue of this section for disability contracted or incurred while aiding or abetting the late rebellion against the authority of the United States.

Mr. CONNOLLY. I offer, to the first section, the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 1, line 5, by inserting the word "involuntary" between the words "prior" and "service."
Also in line 9 by adding the word "involuntary" after the word "such."
Also by adding to said section the following:
"Provided further, That such involuntary service in the Confederate army or navy shall have terminated by May 1, 1861."

Mr. PICKLER. I make the point of order that the gentleman has sent up three amendments, and that only one amendment can be considered at one time.

The CHAIRMAN. The first amendment will be in order.

Mr. CONNOLLY. This is an amendment to the first section.
Mr. PICKLER. But the gentleman has offered three different amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. PICKLER] insists on his point the Chair will hold that only the first amendment is now in order.

Mr. PICKLER. I ask that that be read again.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 1, line 5, by inserting the word "involuntary" between the words "prior" and "service."

Mr. CONNOLLY. The effect of this amendment is to make this section apply to those whose service in the Confederate army was entirely involuntary, and it excludes those whose service was voluntary.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, I hope that this amendment will not prevail. A great deal has been said about this first section. This section, relating to Confederate soldiers, and one or two other sections; the section relating to widows and probably the one in regard to dishonorable discharges, are the only ones in the whole bill that seem to have provoked criticism.

In the first place, I want to say that there are only a very few men left to whom this section will apply. It applies possibly to five or six thousand Confederates who were in Northern prisons, and who while there were induced by our officers to enlist in the Union Army and to go out and fight the Indians. And as to any others who may have been in such service, there is no record, and the belief is such are already pensioned.

Mr. MILES. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PICKLER. No; I can not yield in the short time I have.

Mr. Chairman, our officers promised these men everything that any Union soldier was promised to induce them to enlist in the Army. It was a time, you must remember, when we were needing men, and needing them badly. It was a time when the States were being compelled to resort to the draft in order to secure men. It was a time that every man was needed in the Army, wherever he might come from. There were between five and six thousand of these Confederate soldiers in the prisons at that time, and they were induced by our own officers to go into the service of the Union, under the promise of exactly the same emoluments, the same pay, and the same bounty as all of the Union soldiers were offered. They went in under precisely the same conditions. Now, after they have gone into the service and performed their duty under the promises made to them when they accepted the offer that was held out to them, is this Government to show bad faith toward them? There is but a handful of them left, and shall this Government now turn its back upon them in this matter of pensions?

If this amendment is adopted, if it be required that these men shall prove involuntary service, you make it absolutely impossible for any one of them to come in. It is impossible, of course, as a matter of fact, to prove involuntary service. Thirty years have passed since that service was rendered, and it seems to me that that is the very object of the amendment, that is what the gentleman from Illinois has in view, for he wants these men to say whether they went in voluntarily or otherwise into the Confederate service. It is impossible for them to prove it. That is all they need in the Pension Department now, just some such provision as that to keep them out. The Department would be very glad to be furnished with a requirement that they must establish by proof a fact which it is impossible to bring proof to establish. And so this amendment ought not to prevail. It is not right, it is contrary to the promises of the Government to these men. They are entitled to be put exactly upon the same footing as any Union soldier who enlisted at that time.

Mr. TAWNEY. The gentleman contends that they can not prove that the service was involuntary on their part.

Mr. PICKLER. No; of course not. It would be impossible.

Now, I would like to call the attention of the committee to this point: Under the general law that was passed several years ago a man who was wounded or incurred disability in the service was pensionable—I mean men of this class who went into our Army after serving in the Confederate army and are on the rolls now. Under the law of 1890 they were, under President Harrison's Administration, put on the roll. They have been there until the incoming of this Administration; then, as to the law of 1890, the widows of these men were dropped and their children and the men themselves were dropped from the rolls, those who were in the Confederate service, by this Administration; and the idea now of going into the question of voluntary or involuntary service in the Army, introducing an absolutely impossible requirement, should not have favorable consideration in this committee.

Do not be caught with the idea that this is a reflection on the honor of any Union soldier. Every soldier is known by his own individual record. This proposition is recommended by the legislative committee of the Grand Army, which came here for that purpose, and I hope the gentlemen on this committee will remember that fact; and it is only a very narrow-minded soldier who would, after forgiving the Confederate soldier for everything else, refuse to forgive him for going into the Union Army and doing his duty there as an honorable soldier.

Mr. BLUE. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. PICKLER. I have no time to answer questions; my time is up.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PEARSON. Mr. Chairman, I have a letter which has been addressed to me by a constituent of mine, and the substance of it refers to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CONNOLLY], whose attention I hope I may claim.

The writer of this letter is the post commander of the Marion Roberts Post, in my district, and he gives this much of his biography: Speaking of the time he left North Carolina to go into the Union Army—and I will say to the gentleman from Illinois, who is somewhat acquainted with the geography down there, that it is a truth although it may startle him, and it will doubtless startle the Democrats on this floor, but it is the literal truth, that in my district, the county of Madison sent more soldiers into the Union Army than any county in any State in the whole Union in proportion to its population. This man comes from that county, and he says:

I can say to you that if there is a people in these United States who deserve a pension it is most of those who joined the Union Army first chance, and nearly 10,000 did so from the fall of 1862 to 1863. Some few, I know, joined later, but there is not 1 per cent who did not do nearly two years' service in the Union Army. The men of the Northern Army either volunteered at home without trouble or had to be conscripted, while in the South men had to fight their way for over a hundred miles in order to get a chance to join the Union Army.

I went as a lad, not then 16 years of age, to keep out of the Confederate States army; and I can say this truthfully, that out of 45 who went along with me, 151 miles to Cumberland Gap, Kentucky, 21 of our crowd are buried on the roadside, and their widows and dependent fathers or mothers never can get a cent because they were never enlisted. Shot down, you see, before they could reach the Union flag.

And he goes on to say further:

And we now [say we because whatever affects my comrades affects me] must be stigmatized as cowards or as men hunting for rations—

He seems to have read the RECORD, using the precise language used by the gentleman from Illinois—

It is an accusation that is unjust, especially as coming from our friends (?). We could stand the Confederate bullets, but we can not stand the ingratitude of our own friends.

[Applause.]

Mr. MILES. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. PEARSON. If I had more than five minutes I would allow the gentleman from Maryland five questions, but I must come to the point. Mr. Chairman, this is simply a question of a construction of law. I call the attention especially of my friend from South Carolina to what I am about to read. The law of March 3, 1877, provides that—

The law prohibiting the payment of any money on account of pensions to any person, or to the widow, children, or heirs of any deceased person, who in any manner—

And I ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CONNOLLY] to note this—who in any manner engaged in or aided or abetted the late rebellion against the authority of the United States, shall not be construed to apply to such persons as afterwards voluntarily enlisted in the Army of the United States, and who, while in such service, incurred disability from a wound or injury received or disease contracted in the line of duty.

This was ratified March 3, 1877.

The question is of the voluntary enlistment of these men in the Army of the United States. As to that there can be no doubt.

I have here, Mr. Chairman, a letter which I shall ask to insert in the RECORD, because I have not time to read it. It is as follows:

[No. 530267. Stephen Johnson, Company D, Third Regiment North Carolina Mounted Infantry.]

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, BUREAU OF PENSIONS,
Washington, D. C., April 15, 1896.

SIR: In response to your personal inquiry of recent date, I have the honor to advise you that claimant's name was dropped from the rolls under the act of June 27, 1890, on April 7, 1896, after due notice, on the ground that he rendered voluntary service in the Confederate States army. He is at liberty at any time to file a claim for restoration under said act, together with testimony showing that such service was not voluntary, but until then no further action can be taken in the claim.

Very respectfully,

Hon. RICHMOND PEARSON,
House of Representatives.

WM. LOCHREN, Commissioner.

This is a sample of the letters that I get from the Pension Office. Here is a man who has been dropped from the rolls this month, after he had been there for six years. He is dropped on the ground of service in the Confederate army. Now, the awful alternative forced upon these men was this: They had to fight against their neighbors or against their convictions, and I am here to say in this presence that it is the severest test that can be placed on any man. It was this frightful dilemma to which they were reduced. They had to wade through a flame of fire to get to the Union Army, and this man whose letter I have quoted says that more than half of his comrades were shot down by the way-side before they enlisted. They feel, sir, the humiliation that comes from your stigma [to Mr. CONNOLLY] more than any other wounds that could be inflicted. [Applause.]

Mr. CONNOLLY. Mr. Chairman, let me say to the gentleman that I cast no stigma upon any gentleman who voluntarily enlisted in the Federal Army. I simply spoke of those who had voluntarily served in the Confederate army until about ninety days before the close of the war—

Mr. PICKLER. There is no such case here.

Mr. CONNOLLY (continuing). And then sneaked away to the other army.

Mr. PICKLER. There is no such case here. These men were imprisoned in the North—

Mr. CONNOLLY. I know that North Carolina, east Tennessee, and Kentucky had plenty of good men who came to our lines and fought with them as soon as they could get there. I do not interfere with those men. They are entitled to pensions as much as if they had lived in the North; but it is only those who were Confederates voluntarily and remained so until their cause failed. I do not want to pension those men now. I want the pension roll to be a roll of honor.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PEARSON] has expired.

Mr. PEARSON. I am sure the committee will give me back the time which the gentleman from Illinois has taken. I ask for a minute and a half more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks that his time be extended one minute and a half. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PEARSON. In that minute and a half I close with the expression of the hope which I address to my friend from South Carolina [Mr. TALBERT], that he will feel as I do, remembering that his people and my people fired the bullets that made these wounds, that we may be the last to obstruct the pious friends of these soldiers in binding up their wounds and relieving, as far as they may, the suffering of those heroes. [Applause.] If an objection must be made, let it be made by the copperheads of the North [applause on the Republican side] who did not have the courage to go into that fight; and, lacking courage, they lack the first element of magnanimity, and of course they are now here to do what they can to increase the sufferings of those old soldiers and add to the humiliation of their children and dear ones.

Mr. MILES. Mr. Chairman, I regret to feel compelled to begin my remarks with the statement that the gentleman who has just taken his seat is evidently discussing this question without any knowledge of it. The wounded soldiers to whom he refers have already been pensioned by past liberal legislation on the part of this country.

Mr. PEARSON. I have a letter here stating the case of one who has a wound, and who has been dropped this month.

Mr. MILES. Very well, sir. That does not prove that there is no legislation to cover this class. It probably tends to show that he does not belong to the class. What I desire to have understood by my statement is this: That the act of March 3, 1877, grants pensions to this class for wounds or injuries received or disease contracted in the Union Army, and these are the wounds to which the gentleman so eloquently referred just now, which are already being taken care of by the legislation of 1877.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to read an extract from a letter of Commissioner Lochren, addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, upon this subject. He says:

This section repeals section 4716 of the Revised Statutes of the United States and its amendments, and pensions ex-Confederates who had a later service in the Union Army as if they had never served in the Confederate army.

Then he quotes the act to which I have already referred:

The act of March 3, 1877, grants pensions to this class for wounds or injuries received or diseases contracted in the Union Army. Beyond this I think these galvanized rebels have no color of claim for pension.

Mr. PICKLER. That is a fine term to apply to these Union soldiers—"galvanized rebels."

Mr. MILES. And a very proper appellation to apply to them.

Mr. PICKLER. They were honorably discharged Union soldiers, too.

Mr. MILES. The gentleman has just stated, and he is a Union soldier, and as such ought to know better than one who was born during the war, and I do not set my statement against his, that there are only four or five thousand of these people, and that most of them were taken out of prison. I desire to say that my opinion is that there are not less than 10,000 of the mercenaries alone who deserted during the last year of the war, and who deserted after bounties of $1,800 and $2,000 were offered, and I base this estimate upon information received from reliable sources. I am sustained, too, in this by the opinion of many intelligent Union soldiers with whom I have conferred.

Mr. PICKLER. All you blame them for is because they deserted from the Confederacy.

Mr. MILES. No, sir; the gentleman does me injustice. If these men voluntarily left the Confederate army and entered it originally under any compulsion, or wanted to fight for the Union from the start, and at the earliest opportunity had gone in the Union Army to fight under the Union flag, I honor them, and would have them upon a pension roll that is so constituted as to make a roll of honor, and at as liberal a pension as any other soldier who fought in the late war. But the gentleman does not know all that is to be known about this question, although a soldier. A Union soldier who left an arm in the mountains of Virginia, and a member of this House, made a statement to me, and I am not at liberty to give his name without his consent, that these mercenaries came into his camp after the Confederate star had begun to sink twenty a night, and that they were recognized in that army as mercenaries who were fighting not specially for any flag.

Mr. PICKLER. There is no record of these men.

Mr. MILES. There were plenty of them. My authority is the Commissioner of Pensions, who was himself a Union soldier, and his word is worth something upon that subject. Besides that, Mr. Chairman, when these men had deserted, what service did they render? They were not kept where they could be subjected again to Confederate bullets, because it was well understood that if they were kept to fight against the Confederates and were captured they would be subject to the punishment that is meted out to all deserters, and would be shot, as they deserved to be. For this reason they were sent to the Western frontier, and never at any time after they were deserters did they render any service to the Government of the United States. In this statement I am also sustained by the Commissioner of Pensions.

Mr. PICKLER. That statement is not true, I do not care who makes it. I have the authority of Colonel Ainsworth that they did render service.

Mr. MILES. I believe it is true.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on this amendment is exhausted.

Mr. MILES. I desire to be recognized for two minutes more. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent that he may be allowed to proceed for two minutes more.

Several members objected.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, is an amendment to the amendment now or order?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. LAYTON. I desire to submit an amendment to the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all in the first section after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That on and after the passage of this bill all officers, commissioned and noncommissioned, and all soldiers and sailors who were enlisted between the 15th day of April, 1861, and the 1st day of July, 1865, inclusive, and who served in the military or naval service of the United States in the late war of the rebellion a period of three months or less, and who have been honorably discharged therefrom, shall be placed upon the pension roll of the United States and be entitled to receive for such service a pension of $6 per month."

"That all such officers, soldiers, and sailors who served more than three months and less than one year in the military or naval service of the United States in the late war of the rebellion, and who have been honorably discharged therefrom, shall be placed upon the pension roll of the United States at the rate of $3 per month.

"That all such officers, soldiers, and sailors who served for a period of more than one year and not exceeding two years in the military or naval service of the United States in the late war of the rebellion, and who have been honorably discharged therefrom, shall be placed on the pension roll of the United States and be entitled to receive for such services a pension of $10 per month.

"That all such officers, soldiers, and sailors who served for a period of more than two years and not exceeding three years in the military or naval service of the United States in the late war of the rebellion, and who have been honorably discharged therefrom, shall be placed on the pension roll of the United States and be entitled to receive for such services a pension of $12 per month.

"That all such officers, soldiers, and sailors who served in the military or naval service of the United States in the late war of the rebellion for a period longer than three years, and who have been honorably discharged therefrom, shall be placed upon the pension roll of the United States and be entitled to receive for such services a pension of $14 per month: Provided, That from and after the passage of this act any officer, commissioned or noncommissioned, or any soldier or sailor who at the date of the passage of this act is drawing a pension under existing law, may relinquish the same and accept the provisions of this act, but nothing herein contained shall be construed to authorize any officer, soldier, or sailor to receive any pension under existing laws and also under the provisions of this act at the same time: Provided further, That the provisions of this act shall in no wise interfere with any pension which may hereafter be granted to any officer, soldier, or sailor by any special act of Congress for any disability received while in the service of the United States during the late war of the rebellion."

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against that amendment.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard upon the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. PICKLER. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, in connection with my point of order, that I will put in the RECORD certain figures submitted from the War Department in regard to this service pension. It is an interesting question, and I hope when it is in order that my friend from Ohio will stand by the bill.

The communication referred to is as follows:

[One inclosure.]

RECORD AND PENSION OFFICE, WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, April 14, 1896.

DEAR SIR: In compliance with your request of recent date I have the honor to transmit herewith a memorandum relative to the probable number and ages of the army and navy survivors of the war of the rebellion, and the possible number of beneficiaries under and possible cost of certain proposed pension laws.

Very respectfully,
F. C. AINSWORTH,
Colonel, United States Army, Chief Record and Pension Office.
Hon. J. A. PICKLER,
Chairman Committee on Invalid Pensions,
House of Representatives.

MEMORANDUM RELATIVE TO THE PROBABLE NUMBER AND AGES OF THE ARMY AND NAVY SURVIVORS OF THE WAR OF THE REBELLION AND THE POSSIBLE NUMBER OF BENEFICIARIES UNDER AND POSSIBLE COST OF CERTAIN PROPOSED PENSION LAWS.

The basis of all estimates as to the number of beneficiaries under and the cost of any proposed pension law must be the determination of or an estimate of the number of the survivors of the late war at the present time and of the number who will be surviving at various periods in the future until none shall remain. Such an estimate was prepared by this office in March, 1890, at the request of the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, House of Representatives, for use in the consideration of various proposed measures which culminated in the act approved June 27, 1890. That estimate was as follows:

ESTIMATE OF MARCH 31, 1890.

It should be stated in advance that any estimate of the number and ages of the surviving veterans of the war can not be more than approximately correct, for the reason that the data on which to base such an estimate are deficient in two very important particulars, viz: First, the actual number of individuals in service has never been officially determined, and, second, the numbers of men of different ages upon entry into service, or for any given period of the war, has never been ascertained; nor can the missing data be supplied without a laborious search of the many thousands of original rolls and other records filed in the War and Navy Departments, a work which would require years for its completion.

Moreover, if the exact number and ages of the survivors at the close of the war were known, the problem of determining the number now living and the probable duration of life for each group of ages would still be involved in difficulty, for no life table has ever been constructed which is applicable to such a class of lives as that furnished by the veterans of the late war. While it is the generally accepted opinion that the expectation of life of men of this class is less than that of men of the same ages who have never been exposed to the shock of battle and the hardships and privations of field, camp, and prison, on the other hand it has been very ingeniously urged that, by the operation of the law of the survival of the fittest, the reverse is actually the case, for the reason that the individuals of little endurance and tenacity of life, whose early death materially shortens the average of life among civilians, have long since been eliminated from the class to which the veterans belong, having succumbed either to the hardships and dangers of the war or their subsequent results. Thus, it is claimed, the survivors have become a selected class whose average duration of life is likely to be greater than that of an equal number of nonveterans of the same ages who have not been subjected to this weeding-out process.

It will be readily seen, then, that the problem presented is incapable of anything like an exact solution, and that the results obtained can be nothing more than approximations. But it is also evident that an approximation which is reached after a careful study of all the data available, meager though they are, is of much greater utility than the loose estimates and wild guesses which have heretofore passed current in discussions of this question. Moreover, it is believed that sufficient information is at hand to enable a calculation to be made which can not be very far from correct, and which may be safely used for all practical purposes.

In all the calculations embodied in this memorandum a recent life table (American male) has been used in determining the probable duration of life for each group of ages. The results obtained must be considered to be maximum figures if it is believed that the expectation of life of the veterans of the war is less than that of nonveterans of the same ages. If the reverse is held to be true, as suggested above, then the figures given must be accepted as minimum in all cases. As between these two opposite opinions, in support of each of which there is much to be said, it is perhaps not unreasonable to assume that the mean is more nearly correct than either, and that the probable average duration of life is about the same for the veterans as for nonveterans. If this be held, then the figures given must be considered to be nearly correct.

(This statement requires some modification. The life table which was used in the preparation of the estimate is based upon the experience of insurance companies with a class of lives that were selected, to a certain extent at least, and consequently it will not give absolutely correct results if used in estimating the duration of wholly unselected lives. But, for reasons that are more fully set forth below, it would seem that the expectation of life of the veterans of the war must be somewhat greater than that of nonveterans of the same ages, and, this being the case, that the life table which was used in the preparation of the estimate gave more accurate results than would have been obtained by the use of a table based upon wholly unselected lives.—April, 1896.)

Subject to the foregoing remarks, and to be considered only in connection with them, the following is submitted:

ARMY.

As shown by the latest official statement, the number of men furnished by the different States and Territories during the war, under calls from the President, was 2,778,304. Deducting from this the number of seamen and marines, 105,963, leaves a total of 2,672,341 credited to the Army.

(The strength of the Regular Army at the outbreak of the war was 16,422, but this number has not been taken into account in the calculation, because the majority of the men whom it represents, being professional soldiers, undoubtedly reenlisted or were commissioned in either the regular or volunteer service during the war, and are consequently included in the total number of credits. The strength of the Navy at the beginning of the war has been neglected in the calculation for the same reason.—April, 1896.)

No official compilation has ever been made of the total number of reenlistments in the Army, but various estimates have been made by different authorities, ranging from 370,000 to 716,787. The mean between these two numbers, 543,393, is believed to be a fair approximation of the actual number. Deducting this from the total credited to the Army leaves 2,128,948 as the number of individual soldiers serving in the war.

The number of deaths for the Army is 359,528, and the number of actual deserters at large at the close of the war (making due allowance for those incorrectly reported as deserters) has been estimated at 117,247. Deducting the deaths and deserters leaves 1,652,173 as the probable number of individual soldiers who were alive at termination of service and were not deserters.

NAVY.

The total number of men credited to the several States as having been furnished to the Navy and Marine Corps during the war was 105,963. This figure is taken as the basis of calculation and not the number of enlistments as reported by the Navy Department, which is believed to include a large number of transfers from the Army, and these have already been counted in the Army estimates.

No data are at hand from which to estimate the number of reenlistments, but assuming that their proportion was the same as in the Army, the total number of individuals in service was 84,417. No information has been obtained as to the actual number of desertions, but again assuming that the Army proportion is applicable, the number would be 4,588. The deaths, as reported by the Bureau of Medicine and Surgery, numbered 4,588. Deducting the deaths and desertions leaves 75,180 as the probable number of seamen and marines who were alive at termination of service and not deserters.

ARMY AND NAVY.

Combining the foregoing estimates, it appears that the total number of individuals in the military and naval service during the war was 2,213,365, and of these 1,727,353 were alive at termination of service (deserters excluded).

As in the case of reenlistments, no official compilation has been made of the ages of the men in service at any period of the war. From statistics of the ages at enlistment of about 1,000,000 soldiers, collected by the United States Sanitary Commission, Dr. B. A. Gould, actuary of the commission, formed estimates of the number of men in each year of age. In the absence of better information, and assuming that the age of soldiers, seamen, and marines were relatively the same, the tables published by Dr. Gould have been taken as the basis for calculating the appended table (No. 1), which shows the probable total number of survivors (excluding deserters) on June 30 of each year from 1890 to 1900, inclusive, and at the close of each quinquennial period from 1910 until none shall remain.

Table No. 2 shows the probable number of men who will arrive at the age of 62 years or over June 30, 1890, and of the probable number that will attain the age of 62 in each succeeding year, until practically all shall have passed that age.

In explanation of the foregoing estimate it may be stated here that the life table which was used in the calculations involved was that which is known as the "Thirty American offices" table (male). Since this table is based upon the experience of insurance companies with a selected class of lives, its rates of mortality are somewhat lower than those of other tables that are based upon unselected lives. But, as suggested in the memorandum of 1890, the veterans of the war may be considered to be a selected class, from among whom, by the operation of the law of the survival of the fittest, those individuals of little endurance and tenacity of life have been eliminated, either by the vicissitudes of the war or their subsequent results. In addition to this the lot of the average veteran is very much better than that of the nonveteran, in that the former enjoys the benefit of liberal pension laws, is given preference in municipal, State, and Federal employment, and is cared for by relief associations and in Soldiers' Homes when he needs such care. All of these favorable conditions combined must certainly tend to prolong the life of the class which enjoys their benefit, and there seems to be good ground for the belief that the expectation of life of veterans of the war, in later years at least, is greater than that of nonveterans of the same ages. And for this reason it is believed that the table used in the preparation of the estimate for 1890 and subsequent years has given more accurate results than would have been obtained by the use of a table whose rate of mortality is higher.

It should be observed also that in applying the life table to the determination of the number of survivors at various dates each group of individuals of the same age was dealt with separately, and no attempt was made to use an average age in any calculation. The inaccuracy of the results obtained by the application of a life table to an average age is so well known to those who are at all familiar with statistical matters that it would not be necessary to mention the subject here were it not for the fact that since the publication of the estimate made by this office in 1890 several estimates have emanated from other sources, in which it has been erroneously assumed that the average age of the survivors as determined by this office for a given period could be used as a basis for accurate calculations covering future periods. It is only necessary to say in this connection that because of the greater rate of mortality among, and the resulting more rapid decrease in the number of, the survivors of the higher ages, the average age of the whole class does not increase as rapidly as the age of an individual member of it. For instance, as shown by the estimate of 1890 the average age of all survivors in 1895 was 28 years, whereas in 1895, thirty years later, the average age was only 57 years. The number of survivors on June 30, 1895, as obtained by separately applying the life table to each group of survivors of the same age, differs by more than 40,000 from the number obtained by using an average age in the calculation.

The estimate of 1890 has recently been carefully reconsidered, with the view to determine whether, in the light of data now obtainable, any change should be made in it, and as a result of this reconsideration the conclusion has been reached that there is no ground for the belief that a more accurate estimate than that of 1890 could have been made then or can be made now.

According to the estimate the survivors of the late war (deserters excluded) should have numbered 1,154,810 on June 30, 1895, and if this figure is correct it should be supported by data obtainable from the records of the Pension Bureau.

It has been ascertained from the Commissioner of Pensions that 735,338 survivors of the war were borne on the pension rolls on June 30, 1895; that 116,177 other survivors had claims pending, and that 150,200 "original invalid" claims were on the rejected or abandoned files of the Bureau. These figures include those who have been pensioned for service in the Regular Army and Navy since the war, those who have died with rejected or abandoned claims on file, and some duplications in that class of claims. It is impossible to determine exactly how much of an allowance should be made for these factors, but from the best data obtainable it is estimated by this office that a reduction of 57,540 in the foregoing figures should be made in order to make them represent individual survivors of the war of the rebellion. Making this reduction, it appears the records of the Pension Bureau account for 944,184 survivors on June 30, 1895.

It will be seen from the foregoing statement, then, that the number of survivors on June 30, 1895, as estimated by this office, is 210,626 in excess of the number that can be accounted for by the records of the Pension Bureau on that date, and, if the estimate is correct, this excess must represent the number of those who, up to June 30, 1895, had never made application for pension, and of whom consequently the Pension Bureau could have had no record on that date. This number is, and must always remain, an unknown quantity; but, being freed as it now is from other obscuring factors, it can be considered by itself, and each one interested in the problem can pass his own judgment upon it.

It is believed that the number of survivors of the war who have never made application for pension is considerably larger than those who have given the question but little thought are accustomed to estimate it to be. There are several different classes of veterans who have not applied for pension. The first and probably the largest of these is made up of those who are yet comparatively young men, who are still vigorous and able-bodied, and who are free from disabilities or ailments that disqualify them in any degree for the performance of manual labor or the discharge of their accustomed duties. The fact that this class is a very large one will be better appreciated when it is considered that, according to the estimates of this office, the average age of all survivors of the war on June 30, 1895, was only 57 years, and consequently (because of the preponderance of enlistments at the lower ages) at least half of them, or more than half a million in all, must have been younger than that, and many of them must have been considerably younger. In addition there must be considered those of all ages who have never applied for pension because of their prosperous circumstances, or for sentimental reasons, or because they are aware that they are suffering from disabilities that are not pensionable under any law. Of course there is no means of determining the total number of persons who are comprised in these four classes, but it needs but little reflection to convince anyone that the number must be a large one, and it would seem that it must equal, if it does not exceed, the 210,626 which must be added to the 944,184 considered to be accounted for by the records of the Pension Bureau on June 30, 1895, in order to make 1,154,810, which is the total number of survivors (deserters excluded) that is shown by the original estimate of this office for that date. This is in the proportion of 817.61 applicants for pension and 182.30 nonapplicants per thousand of all pensionable survivors.

It does not seem unfair to assume that in every thousand honorably discharged survivors of the late war there were, on June 30, 1895, 182 who for various reasons had never made application for pension, and that the estimate of this office as to the total number of survivors on that date is very nearly correct. And if the estimate is correct for the date in question it can be demonstrated to be equally correct for other dates covered by it.

But, as stated above, this question is one in the solution of which each inquirer can well exercise his own judgment. Those who believe that more than 318 in every thousand of the honorably discharged survivors of the war had, on June 30, 1895, made application for pension, must consider the estimate as to the total number of survivors on that date to be too large; whereas those who believe that less than 318 per thousand had applied for pension on that date must consider the estimate too small.

A special enumeration of survivors was made during the census of 1890, and in a recently published statement of the Commissioner of Labor in charge of the Eleventh Census (Senate Document No. 135, Fifty-fourth Congress, first session) the total number of survivors, as shown by the population schedules, is given as 1,094,073. But the census enumeration could not possibly have included all the survivors, because many of them were out of the country at the time, and many more must have failed to be enumerated as such for various reasons. It requires but a brief examination of the census figures to show that they fall far short of representing the total number of survivors in 1890, and that they can not be relied upon as the basis of any calculation for the future. If, as shown by the census report, there were 1,094,073 survivors of the war of the rebellion in 1890, of the ages ascertained by the enumerators, this number should have fallen, according to the life tables, to 919,954 on June 30, 1895. But this last number is only 80,917 in excess of the number of survivors who were either on the pension rolls or had claims pending at that date, excluding Regular Army and Navy pensioners and claimants who served since the war, and is 24,280 less than the number that, as previously pointed out in this paper, can be considered to have been accounted for by the records of the Pension Office on that date, to say nothing of the very large number of those who had never applied for pension, and of whom, consequently, the Pension Office could have had no record. It is confidently believed, therefore, that the figures shown by the estimate made by this office are much more reliable than those shown by the census of 1890 as the basis of any calculation for the future.

There has recently been made in this office a careful examination of the records of all organizations that are known to have been in the military service less than ninety days, and of all in which any considerable number of men are known to have served less than ninety days, and as a result of this examination it has been found that 42,353 officers and enlisted men served less than ninety days in these organizations. But it is well known that a large proportion of the short-term men had service under prior or subsequent enlistments. It is impossible to ascertain from the official records how many men served under two or more enlistments, because the records, as a rule, do not connect one enlistment with another and do not afford any means of determining whether similar or identical names borne on the rolls of two or more different organizations refer to one and the same man or to two or more different men. However, it is believed that fully three-fourths of the 42,353 members of the short-term organizations now under consideration, having been brought into service in other organizations, or in the same organizations at different periods, through patriotic motives, the operation of the draft, or the inducement of bounties, served a sufficient length of time to make their whole service exceed ninety days, and that the remaining one-fourth, or 10,581, fairly represents the number that rendered no service other than that of less than ninety days in these organizations.

It should be observed that in this connection no account is taken of the men who were discharged for disability or who deserted from both long and short term organizations and at various times throughout the whole war after a service of less than ninety days. It is evident that these should not be considered in estimating the number of beneficiaries under a per diem pension bill, because practically all of this class who were discharged for disability incurred in service may be presumed to have been pensioned already or to be pensionable under the general law at a rate higher than that to which their short service would entitle them under a per diem law, and that, consequently, they will not be applicants for pension under such a law; and those who would become beneficiaries under any other service-pension law must be so few that their number need not be considered in estimating the cost of that law. Deserters of course can not come within the provisions of any law whose benefits are restricted to those having honorable discharges from the military or naval service, and they have been excluded from all the calculations embodied in this paper.

Assuming the ages of the 10,581 short-term men referred to above to have been relatively the same as the ages of all other survivors at the termination of service, their number should have fallen, according to the life table, to 7,074 on June 30, 1896, and this figure must be excluded in estimating the cost of any law under which those who have served less than ninety days can not become beneficiaries.

There has also been made an examination of the records of all organizations that are known to have been in the military service more than ninety days but less than six months, and of all in which any considerable number of men are known to have served more than ninety days but less than six months, and as a result of this examination it has been found that 236,409 officers and enlisted men served more than ninety days and less than six months in these organizations. Adding to this number 42,323, to include those who served less than three months as explained above, it is found that 280,732 officers and enlisted men served less than six months in the organizations now under consideration, not taking into account those who were discharged for disability or who deserted at various times during the war, and from both long and short term organizations, after a service of less than six months. For the reason stated above, it is impossible to ascertain how many of these men served under two or more enlistments, but as the records show that 233,351 of them enlisted in organizations whose periods of service were one hundred days or less, it is believed that at least one-half of the total number, or 140,396, had prior or subsequent service sufficient to make their total service exceed six months.

Assuming the ages of these 140,396 men to have been relatively the same as the ages of all other survivors at the termination of service, their number should have fallen to 93,861 on June 30, 1896, and this figure must be excluded in calculating the cost of any law whose benefits are restricted to those who served six months or more.

Following is an estimate of (1) the number that will be pensionable under, and the possible cost of, an act granting a pension of $8 per month to all honorably discharged survivors of the late war who are 62 years of age and over and who are not now on the pension roll, and increasing to $9 per month the pensions of all those who are now pensioned at a rate less than that; (2) the number that will be affected by, and the possible cost of, a similar law whose benefits shall be restricted to survivors who are 62 years of age or over, and who served six months or more; (3) the number that will be pensionable under, and the possible cost of, a law pensioning at $12 per month all survivors who are not now on the pension roll, but who served ninety days or more during the war, and increasing to $13 per month the pensions of all survivors who are now on the pension roll at a rate less than that, but who served ninety days or more; (4) the number that will be pensionable under, and the possible cost of, an act granting to all survivors who are not now on the pension roll a pension of 1 cent per month for each day of their service during the war, and increasing to an amount equal to 1 cent per month for each day of service the pensions of all survivors who are now on the pension roll at a rate less than that; (5) the number that will be affected by, and the possible cost of, a similar law whose benefits shall be restricted to survivors who served ninety days or more.

It should be understood that these estimates are subject to the remarks made in connection with the estimate of 1890, and are to be considered only in connection therewith. It should also be understood that the term "survivors," as used in the estimates, excludes deserters in all cases.

I.

EIGHT DOLLARS PER MONTH. SIXTY-TWO YEARS.

Survivors at 62 years or over on June 30, 1896, excluding pensioners at $8 or over per month.

Assuming that a law has been enacted granting a pension of $8 per month to all honorably discharged survivors of 62 years of age and over who are not now on the pension roll, and increasing to $9 per month the pensions of all survivors of 62 years of age and over who are now on the pension roll at a rate less than $8 per month, and assuming that the ages of all those who would come within the provisions of such a law are relatively the same as the ages of all survivors of the war, whether pensioned or not, the maximum possible number of beneficiaries under the law on June 30, 1896, would be 130,991, and the maximum possible addition during the year following that date to the annual expenditures for pensions under other laws would be $9,983,406. Following is a table showing for each year from 1896 to 1910, and for quinquennial periods thereafter, the total number of pensionable survivors of 62 years of age or over who are not now on the pension roll or are pensioned at rates less than $8 per month, also the total amount required each year to pension all such survivors, and the increase or decrease of such total amount from year to year.

The figures given for the year 1896 and a few succeeding years are undoubtedly too large, because they have been based upon the assumption that the ages of those who would be affected by the proposed law, especially of those who are not now on the pension roll, are relatively the same as the ages of all survivors, whether now on the pension roll or not.

But it seems probable that the average age of those who are not on the pension roll is less than that of pensioners, because the class of nonpensioners must be very largely composed of the younger survivors who have not been able or who have not cared to obtain pensions under the act of June 27, 1890. This being the case, the figures for a few of the earlier years in the table must be too large, because those who have been counted as being 62 years of age in any particular one of those years, but are actually not so old, will become 62 in a later year. In addition to this, the only accessible figures showing the number on the pension roll are those given in the last annual report of the Commissioner of Pensions and represent the condition of that roll on June 30, 1896. Of course a considerable number of nonpensioners will have been pensioned under existing laws between that date and June 30, 1896. Although their number and the total amount of their pensions can not be foretold, the actual expenditure under the proposed law will be reduced thereby somewhat below the estimate in the table.

The table only represents what is believed to be the maximum annual expenditure that is possible in future under the proposed law. Of course, it is not at all probable that, if such a law should be enacted immediately, all those who now come within its provisions would be pensioned, or even would have filed application for pensions, as early as June 30, 1897, and for this reason also the estimate in the table of the expenditure for that year and the year following that date is too large. But this factor is not of so much importance in the calculation for later years, because the majority of those whose claims can not be adjudicated or are not filed within the first year of the existence of such a law will probably become pensioners under it within a short time afterwards.

In estimating the effect that the proposed law would produce upon the total expenditures of the Government for pension purposes in future it should be borne in mind that many of those who would be pensioned in the near future under such a law will without such a law be pensioned in the near future under the existing act of June 27, 1890, because they will shortly be brought within the operation of that act by reason of the infirmities of advancing age, if for no other reason. In addition to this, there should be taken into account the diminution in pension expenditures which will be caused in the future by the death of those who are now drawing pensions under existing laws.

EIGHT DOLLARS PER MONTH. SIXTY-TWO YEARS. SIX MONTHS' SERVICE.

Survivors at 62 years or over on June 30, 1896, who served six months or more, excluding pensioners at $8 or over per month.

A law pensioning at $8 per month all honorably discharged survivors who are not now on the pension roll, but who are 62 years of age or over and who served six months or more during the war, and increasing to $9 per month the pensions of all survivors who are now on the pension roll at a rate less than that, but who are 62 years of age or over and who served six months or more, would differ from the measure discussed in the foregoing section of this paper only in one particular, viz., that its benefits would be restricted to those who, in addition to being 62 years of age, rendered six months or more of military or naval service during the war. In attempting to make an estimate of the number of persons that can possibly be beneficiaries under, and the possible cost of, such a measure it is found that a new factor is introduced into the problem, and that in addition to the number and ages of the survivors, the length of service of those survivors must be taken into account.

As stated above, a recent examination of the records of volunteer organizations on file in this office has led to the conclusion that 140,396 officers and enlisted men, exclusive of those who were discharged for disability or who deserted, served less than six months, and that of this number 93,861 were living on June 30, 1896. It is presumed that the majority of those who were discharged for disability after a total service of less than six months have been pensioned already, or are pensionable, under the general law at a rate equal to or exceeding $8 per month, and that those who were so discharged and are now pensioned at less than that or are not pensioned at all, and who may consequently become beneficiaries under such a law as that now under consideration, are so few that their number can not perceptibly affect the cost of the law and need not enter into the estimate. And deserters, having, for obvious reasons, been excluded from all the calculations embodied in this paper.

Following is a table showing for each year from 1896 to 1910, and for quinquennial periods thereafter until no survivors shall remain, the probable total number of pensionable survivors at 62 years of age or over, who served six months or more, and who are not now on the pension roll or who are pensioned at less than $8 per month, also the total amount required each year to pension all such survivors, and the increase or decrease of such total amount from year to year. All remarks made with regard to the figures in the table in the preceding section apply with equal force to the figures in the following table:

TWELVE DOLLARS. NINETY DAYS' SERVICE.

Survivors on June 30, 1896, who served ninety days or more, excluding pensioners at $12 or over per month.

Under a law providing a service pension of $12 per month for all those who are not now pensioned, but who served ninety days or more during the war and were honorably discharged, and increasing to $12 per month the pensions of all those who are now borne on the pension roll at a rate less than that, all honorably discharged survivors who are not now pensioned could become beneficiaries to the extent of $12 per month each, provided they served ninety days or more; and all those now on the pension roll at a rate less than $12 per month would be entitled to have their pensions increased to that amount, if their service equaled or exceeded ninety days. Following is a table showing for each year, from 1890 to 1910, and for quinquennial periods thereafter until no survivors shall remain, the probable total number of survivors pensionable under such a law, the possible total expenditure under the law, and the decrease in that expenditure from year to year. It is to be understood that this table is to be considered only in connection with the explanatory remarks made in preceding sections of this paper:

ONE CENT PER DIEM.

Survivors on June 30, 1896, excluding those who are receiving pensions equal to or exceeding 1 cent per month for each day of service.

It is apparent that under a law pensioning, at the rate of 1 cent per month for each day of service, all those who are not now on the pension roll, and increasing to an amount equal to 1 cent per month for each day of service the pensions of those who are now on the pension roll at a rate less than that per month, all honorably discharged survivors who are not now pensioned could become beneficiaries, as well as those who are now pensioners but whose service was of such a length that the pensions they would receive under such a law would be greater than those which they are now receiving under existing law. The latter class includes a considerable number of pensioners who are now receiving more than the average pension that would be allowed under a per diem law, but whose length of service was such that they would be entitled to more under a per diem law than they are now receiving.

Such a measure would be a pension law from the benefits of which no honorably discharged veteran would be excluded, however short his service, and under which the amount of pension to be paid would depend entirely upon the length of service in each case. Subject to remarks made elsewhere in this paper, the following table is given as showing for each year from June 30, 1890, to June 30, 1910, and for each quinquennial period thereafter until no survivors shall remain, the probable number of pensioners under a law such as that now under consideration, the possible total expenditure under the law, and the decrease in that expenditure from year to year:

From the foregoing statement it will be seen that all of the measures discussed therein contemplate a service pension, although some of them differ widely as to the basis upon which the proposed pension shall be granted. The two $8 per month measures, which only propose to pension survivors at the age of 62 years or over, would involve a minimum expenditure at the beginning, but this expenditure would increase from year to year until 1907, when the maximum would be reached by reason of the fact that nearly all of the survivors will have become 62 years of age on that date, after which there would be a steady decrease in the annual expense. These two propositions differ from each other only in the fact that one of them contains a requirement of six months' service, which would permanently exclude all those who served less than six months, and would reduce the first annual outlay from $9,983,496 to $9,172,130, or a little over 8 per cent.

The $12 per month bill and both the "1 cent per diem" measures would each necessitate a maximum annual expenditure in the near future, which would steadily diminish thereafter. The maximum possible cost of the $12 bill, if enacted into a law, would be $79,303,291, as against $42,730,030 for a law providing a pension of 1 cent per month for each day of service, with no restriction as to the length of service, making a difference between the two of $36,563,271 in favor of the latter.

As has been pointed out elsewhere in this paper, the number of survivors who served less than ninety days during the war is very small, and the effect of a requirement of ninety days' service in a "one cent per diem" pension law would be simply to exclude from the benefits of the law a few men, no one of whom could receive, if pensioned under the law, more than 80 cents per month, while the average for all of them would be less than 50 cents per month. The estimated total expenditure that would be possible under such a law for the first year would be reduced $40,750 by debarring those who served less than 90 days.

F. C. AINSWORTH.

Colonel, United States Army, Chief Record and Pension Officer.

RECORD AND PENSION OFFICE,
War Department, April 14, 1896.

Mr. LAYTON. I hope the Chair will hear me on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has already ruled and sustained the point of order. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. LAYTON. I would simply say this is a provision creating a service pension in a general bill relating to pensions.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois. The Chair has already ruled on the point of order.

Mr. LAYTON. I simply ask for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. That can only be granted by unanimous consent.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. After the Chair—

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that he may be heard for two minutes.

Several members objected.

Mr. LAYTON. I respectfully appeal from the decision of the Chair, and upon that I desire to be heard for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The appeal comes rather late, but the Chair will indulge the gentleman.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, I call the attention of the House, and not only of the House, but of the country, to the fact that the pending bill is entitled "A bill relating to pensions," and its first section—I want to emphasize and accentuate this point—provides for a certain class of pensioners being placed upon the pension roll. Now, my amendment also provides for another class of pensioners being placed upon the roll, and I would like to ask any parliamentarian whether or not such an amendment is not germane to the bill?

Mr. PICKLER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LAYTON. I have only two minutes—I can not yield. I repeat, Mr. Chairman, the first section of the pending bill provides for a certain class of pensioners, to wit, men who served in the rebel army, being placed upon the roll. Instead of that I move to strike that out and to insert a provision that pensions shall be granted to men who served in the Union Army for a graded service pension; and hence, I repeat, can any gentleman who has any knowledge of parliamentary law honestly say that that amendment is not germane to the first section of the bill? My bill provides for a service pension of not less than $6 a month to every old soldier of the Union Army who served three months or less and who has an honorable discharge, $8 a month to those who served more than three months and less than one year, $10 a month to those who served more than one year and less than two years, and $14 a month to those who served more than three years.

Mr. TAWNEY. Why did not the Fifty-third Congress, when the Democrats had the power, pass that bill?

Mr. LAYTON. That is the character of the proposition I now present, and I appeal to this House to permit a vote to be taken upon this amendment, which is offered in good faith, providing pensions for "sure-enough" Union soldiers instead of for men who served in the Confederate army. It is for the purpose of getting action upon this proposition, which is offered by me in the utmost good faith, that I have most respectfully appealed from the decision of the Chair, for whom personally I have the highest regard.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, in this bill from the first section to the seventeenth, every section in it having been placed there by the Committee on Invalid Pensions and on their own suggestion, there is not one that adds a new class of pensioners to the roll; but the gentleman from Ohio proposes an amendment which does add an entirely new class. The ex-Confederate soldiers who are recognized under the first section of this bill were recognized as a pensionable class until lately. The gentleman's proposition is for a new class of pensioners to be granted a service pension, men who as a class have never been on the pension roll. Now, any amendment which proposes to place a new class of pensioners on the roll is not and can not be in order on this bill. We are all anxious for the passage of a service-pension bill; we have been considering it in the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and I trust that the gentleman from Ohio will stand by his guns when we get it where it can be considered, because this side of the House is for it solidly. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. LAYTON. If this first section of the pending bill does not provide for a new class of pensioners, why have it in the bill at all?

Mr. PICKLER. Because we are trying to cure the present maladministration of the Pension Bureau. The bill as reported covers only such cases as were covered by the law and were getting pensions under the Harrison Administration. This bill does not create any new class at all, while it does prescribe rules and regulations to facilitate the allowance of pensions.

Mr. LAYTON. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that this is a specific, absolute provision, placing upon the pension roll certain persons who served in the Confederate army, and that it does not provide for any construction of any existing law.

Mr. PICKLER. Your substitute does not cut out these very Confederates that you are talking about; it includes them.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. The amendment having been offered, the point of order having been made upon it, and the Chair having decided the point of order, shall we be compelled to sit and listen to a wrangle for half an hour, taking up time, when objection is made?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAYTON] appealed from the decision of the Chair, and the discussion has been on the appeal.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, I am quite sure the chairman of our committee does not wish to misrepresent me.

Mr. PICKLER. No, sir.

Mr. LAYTON. If he will listen to the reading of my amendment—

Mr. PICKLER. I call for the reading of the substitute.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman— [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"] I desire, Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made to the gentleman proceeding.

Mr. LAYTON. I am talking on the appeal.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can not recognize the gentleman a second time on that question.

Mr. LAYTON. I should like to be heard for a moment only.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from South Dakota yield?

Mr. PICKLER. Of course I do not.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Is this controversy between the gentleman from Ohio and the gentleman from South Dakota in order?

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from South Dakota, having the floor, yields to the gentleman from Ohio—

Mr. BARTLETT of New York (interposing). How many times can the gentleman from South Dakota get the floor?

Mr. PICKLER. I have had it only once.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I thought you had had it three or four times.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. PICKLER] yield to the gentleman from Ohio for a question?

Mr. PICKLER. Yes, sir, for a question.

Mr. LAYTON. The gentleman has stated, as I understand, that my amendment would permit the first section to remain in the bill—

Mr. PICKLER. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. LAYTON. I understood the gentleman to say that my amendment, if adopted, would permit the first section to remain in the bill?

Mr. PICKLER. No; I say that the gentleman's substitute would strike out the first section. But the substitute provides that every soldier who served ninety days in the United States service and was honorably discharged shall be entitled to this class of pension; and that would cover these very Confederates who rendered service in that way.

Mr. LAYTON. Yes, sir. But, mark you, the existing law excludes the class of men here provided for in the first section, viz, ex-Confederates.

Mr. PICKLER. I insist that the appeal from the ruling of the Chair should not be sustained by the Committee of the Whole. This amendment creates a new class of pensioners. It provides for a service pension; and it shows why some of our friends over there were so anxious to get an opportunity to offer amendments to this bill. Now, sir, they can not put this side of the House in a false position on the question of service pension. We are for such a pension; and I trust, sir, that the election this fall will so demonstrate the wishes of the people and have such an effect in placing revenue in the Treasury of the United States that at the closing session of this Fifty-fourth Congress we may ingraft on the statute books a service pension for every old soldier [applause]; and this is, I know, the desire of this side of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the House?

The question being taken, it was decided in the affirmative.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is now on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. POOLE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the first section of the bill now under consideration engaged the attention of the Committee on Invalid Pensions to as large an extent as all the rest of the bill, and we were substantially agreed upon that section as it now appears. The amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, while it seems to be an innocent proposition, is, in my opinion, a very dangerous one. It provides for inserting the word "involuntary" before the word "service," in line 5. Right there is where the danger arises. It is impossible for these men to prove that they entered the rebel service involuntarily.

There were thousands of men that entered the rebel army along the border States because they found it necessary to do so in order to save their lives. They knew well that to remain in that country and not take sides with the Confederacy meant certain death to them. Therefore thousands of them enlisted in the Confederate service, serving a shorter or a longer time, but at the very first opportunity they deserted to our lines and became Union soldiers. It is this class of men we want to protect. That has been the object of the committee in the preparation of the bill. We sought to give these men who thus served their country and their flag the same rights as Union soldiers from the North. I claim, Mr. Chairman, that these men took greater chances than even we of the North; for, sir, as everyone knows, if they had been captured in battle by their former comrades their lives would not have been worth a cent; they would have been shot for desertion. Hence I claim it is no more than fair that after they have served their flag and their country in the Union Army for ninety days they should receive the same generous treatment that we give to the Union soldiers who went from the Northern States.

One other thing. In this very Congress we have removed the ban which for thirty years remained upon those men who, having been educated at the expense of the United States at West Point or Annapolis and received commissions in our Army and Navy, afterwards deserted their flag and engaged in the service of the rebellion, remaining in it, in most cases, till the end of the war. Thirty years ago we said that those men should not again be permitted to receive commissions in the Army or Navy of the United States. But in the present Congress we have repealed this act and made it possible for them to hold commissions in the Army or Navy.

Now, why not be generous to these men, many of them of humble position, who were Union men at heart and who, when the opportunity came, did service for the Union? Why not extend to these men the same generosity that we have extended to those who fought us through the war, who deserted the flag of the United States in order to do so, and many of whom never repented. I voted freely for the bill restoring those men to their former rights. I thought it time that we should extend the olive branch to all the men of the South, giving them the opportunity to show themselves, as they claim to be, good Union men like ourselves. But I do not think it fair that these other men who did us good service during the war should be denied the little rights that we can extend to them under this bill.

Mr. PICKLER. Does not the gentleman know that the effect of this amendment is simply to put into the law what they have been holding at the Pension Office?

Mr. POOLE. I so understand.

Mr. PICKLER. And we should not sustain the Pension Office in a wrong ruling.

Mr. POOLE. Mr. Chairman, I want to say to the ex-Confederate soldiers on this floor that we concede that in this Congress they have been generous. I have never seen an ex-Confederate soldier oppose the pension bill of any Union soldier. I hope that we shall be as generous to the men of the South who were loyal in their hearts and as soon as the opportunity offered became Union men, as the men of the South in this Congress have been toward the Union soldier.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CONNOLLY].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment I send to the desk as an addition to the first section.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert in line 12, at the end of the section, as follows:

"Provided further, That in the administration of the Pension Bureau all laws shall be construed liberally in the interest of the claimant; and in no case shall the claimant be required to furnish a measure of proof that excludes all reasonable doubt, but he shall only be required to establish his claim by a fair preponderance of proof."

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. I wish to offer an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. HEPBURN. It has been suggested to me that this amendment be offered as an additional section, and I will do so and ask the Clerk to number it properly, allowing it to follow the first section.

I do not care to discuss it and hope we may have a vote upon it. Mr. PICKLER. Let us understand this matter. How do you propose to get it into the bill? As an independent section?

Mr. PEARSON. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PEARSON. If this is to be a separate section it is not in order now on the discussion of the first section.

Mr. HEPBURN. On reflection, I will renew my former motion to have it added as an additional paragraph to the first section.

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. Chairman, a word only in regard to this matter as a member of the committee.

As this amendment relates distinctively to the administrative features of the law, I heartily favor the amendment, and hope it will be adopted by the committee.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Now, Mr. Chairman, I offer what I send to the desk as an amendment to the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

That hereafter, in the administration of the pension laws and determination of the rights of any claimant to a pension, or an increase of pension, the same shall be determined solely on the sworn testimony or affirmation of witnesses, taken under the provisions of law; and the unsworn statements of any person or persons relative to the credibility of witnesses, or as to supposed facts in connection with such claims, shall not be considered or accepted by the Pension Office officials to impeach or discredit the sworn statements or affirmations of a witness.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say to the committee that in my judgment the amendment which has just been read to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] not only covers the point of the amendment offered by him, but goes a little further, and in the right direction.

Here we have laws under which pensions are to be granted to relieve soldiers who can prove up their cases; and under the law they are required to prove their claims by certain statements. Under the practice of the office a system has grown up which has gone beyond anything in that line ever recognized in any civilized country on the face of the earth. A claimant for a pension is required to prove by the oath of witnesses—officers, comrades, and himself—that his disabilities were incurred in the service, if under the general law of 1861; and after all that is done and proven to the satisfaction of any court of record in any State in the Union, then the Pension Office holds up the pension claim and sends out a notice to a postmaster in the vicinity of where the claimant lives, or to some other private individual and asks that individual to say is the testimony, for instance of the gentleman from South Dakota, who has sworn to the incurrence of the disability—is the testimony reliable; is he a credible witness, and ought he to be believed on oath?

That private letter comes into the Pension Office after a while, and on it they may hold up or reject the claim—on a private or secret letter, giving to it more weight in the office than to all of the affidavits of the officers or privates of his company or regiment who have testified in favor of the claimant.

The only object of the amendment is to let every case stand upon the evidence or affirmation of witnesses and to prevent private letters from being received as a better class of proof than that. It prescribes that these letters shall never be taken to impeach the testimony of a sworn witness, or the testimony of the colonel or captain of the company in which the man served; but let them all be decided by the evidence furnished in the case, and if the applicant is not able to furnish the evidence required, then the claim will be rejected.

This is a matter of interest to every pension claimant in the United States, and I do not want the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions to get up and retaliate on me that I was not in the Army and could not be a friend to the soldier, and that he was the man.

This amendment is intended to reach and remedy a serious trouble that has grown up in this country. It has grown up not only in the present, but in other Administrations, and there is not a man, woman, or child having a claim for pension on file in this country but would be glad to see the amendment adopted and an end put to a system that has prevailed so long and so injuriously to these claimants. It only seeks to secure justice. If a man is entitled to a pension and proves it by sworn testimony or the affirmation of witnesses under the law, let him have it, and do not take the private statements of secret spies, which go in as confidential communications to impeach the testimony of sworn witnesses.

I believe this will appeal to the justice and fairness and good sense of my Democratic friends who favor those things, and I know that of course no Republican can object to it if he is a friend of the soldier.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PICKLER. I should like, in my time, to hear the amendment of the gentleman reported.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. PICKLER. Now, Mr. Chairman, I admit the gentleman's interest in the old soldiers. I know he is loyal to them, and I want to say right here that no man in this House, on either side of it, has ever heard me impugn the motives of any man on any question. I do not do that. Now, if the gentleman's amendment should carry, not another person could get a pension.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Why?

Mr. PICKLER. I will tell you why. You cut out the statements of the physicians.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Oh, no.

Mr. PICKLER. You cut out the records of the War Department.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Not at all.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. The official records.

Mr. PICKLER. Well, let us have the amendment read again; I so understood it.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. PICKLER. There is no provision for the war records in that. Besides that, Mr. Chairman, we have here a section that says every claimant and his attorney can go and look over everything in the Pension Office. My friend knows very well that there will be no trouble about that hereafter. We provide that the claimant and his attorney shall have access to every paper that is filed, and that is protection enough to the soldier.

It very often happens, gentlemen, that unsworn statements come in which are very beneficial to the soldier. You cut those off by this amendment. I know the gentleman means well, but his proposition is too broad, and it would be impracticable. He is erecting a new system of evidence that ought not to come in.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the gentleman from South Dakota if it is not a fact that the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois is provided for in section 4, which states—

That hereafter, in the administration of the pension laws, all investigations into the merits of any pension previously allowed shall be by question and answer, under oath, in open session, after due notice to the person or persons who may be affected thereby to be present personally or by attorney.

Mr. PICKLER. I think the gentleman means to go further than that. He means to reach these letters that are written by postmasters.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Certainly; that is my intention.

Mr. PICKLER. I want to call attention further to the proviso in section 5:

Provided, That no claim shall be rejected because of claimant's inability to furnish, as to any material fact in the case, the testimony of more than one credible witness having knowledge of such fact.

Mr. VAN HORN. Mr. Chairman, there are other amendments which we want to reach. Let us have a vote on this.

Mr. PICKLER. I think the proposition which I have just read is open and fair. While I concede the earnestness of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SMITH], I do not think his amendment ought to prevail. It is erecting a new system of evidence that I think might be very detrimental to the allowance of claims.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. It does not erect any system of evidence; it simply holds them down to a system of evidence.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SMITH].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SMITH of Illinois) there were—ayes 2, noes 52.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN].

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, there is one expression in the pending amendment which is objectionable. It is the term "beyond a reasonable doubt." "Reasonable doubt" has its entire application to the criminal law. Its use would assume that all our old soldiers belong to the criminal class. I object to the use of the term.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN].

Mr. PICKLER. I want to say to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], and in behalf of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, that in the bill H. R. 5549, the former print of this bill, of which this is largely a part, we had a section providing that in the administration of the pension laws, in cases of doubt, the presumption shall be in favor of the claimant. I understand that is about what the gentleman intends.

Mr. HEPBURN. Will the gentleman tell us why that was stricken out?

Mr. PICKLER. I will tell you why it was stricken out, and I have no hesitancy in doing so. This is a very important measure, as we believe. It is so regarded by the Grand Army of the Republic all over the country. They sent their legislative committee here, and this bill has their approval. We went over it in detail. They approved of this bill in detail. There is not a section in it but what they approved. We had a section in regard to the presumption being in favor of the soldier; but upon further discussion with other friends of the soldiers it was concluded that it might perhaps be better to restrict this bill somewhat, so as to get a bill that would be sure to go through the Senate and sure to pass the White House.

I say I do not believe that anybody asked to keep anything out of this bill that was not done in the interest of the soldier. I have no objection to the amendment, individually. In leaving this section out of the bill the point which we had in our mind was whether we might not have an amendment adopted in this bill that might go further than was necessary, as this should be the construction of the Pension Office without a statute. I believe the presumption ought to be with the soldier. Individually I do not think there is any danger in it; and yet, gentlemen, we are seeking to pass a bill that will be approved by the Senate and by the President; and if this bill is adopted, if it shall become law—and that shows the necessity of the law—it will help soldiers more than any law that has been passed since the law of 1890; and in connection with and supplemental to laws, some of them passed at this term of Congress, it will put a large majority of the rejected and discontinued and delayed cases in the Pension Office in a condition to go on the rolls.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. MILES. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. PICKLER. I yield first to the gentleman from New York, and then I will answer the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions if the Grand Army disagrees with the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa, because it is very important that we should know how we are to vote as to this. [Laughter.]

Mr. PICKLER. I know what there is behind your point. Ah, my friend from New York, if you have not more patriotism than your speech the other day evinced I do not suppose the opinions of the Grand Army would have any effect on you. The patriotism of the gentleman's speeches on this bill is at a very low ebb.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Does the gentleman from South Dakota think that voting for this amendment, which would deny a pension to men who were base enough to fight under two flags—

Mr. PICKLER. They were under the wrong flag and came to the right one, under our promises to treat them as other Union soldiers, and it is cowardly for this Government to now refuse.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York (continuing). And men who were bounty jumpers, shows a lack of patriotism?

Mr. PICKLER. There is no bounty jumper provided for in this bill, the statement of the gentleman to the contrary notwithstanding. This is the section relating to deserters or those dishonorably discharged, and there are no bounty jumpers included or provided for in this bill.

This bill is to relieve the boy who went home to see a sick mother, or the poor husband who went home to see a dying wife, as was done in an instance that was given to me yesterday. A soldier heard that his wife was dying. He went to the colonel and asked for a furlough, and was told that he could not have it. He said to the boys that night, "I can not get this furlough." When the next day came he learned that his wife had died. He had one child that was 4 years old and another that was 2 years old; and he said, "Boys, I am going to place these children out in the hands of neighbors to take care of; but I will come back." He went, and he came back inside of thirty days, but was reported as a deserter. This will allow that class of men to be granted an honorable discharge. These are the men whose cases are cured by this bill. The bounty jumpers never went South. They were in New York City and cities of the North. [Applause and laughter.] These men never got South, and they never had an opportunity to desert.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Will the gentleman answer one question?

Mr. PICKLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I do not care about having a stump speech or stump oratory in reply.

Mr. PICKLER. That is not a question.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Does the gentleman mean to assert that the thirteenth section of this bill does not apply to men who were bounty jumpers?

Mr. PICKLER. I do. Theoretically it might, but not practically. I do not believe that there is one man who is a bounty jumper in the whole country who claimed a pension that has not been able to get one. Such men after the war closed would get up their false evidence, and could get a pension then if it could be gotten at all. The purpose of this bill is to help those against whom the charge of desertion was made, and who found that it was made thirty years afterwards. These are the ones that this bill is designed to help. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman from New York a question. I have heard a great deal said about pensioning men who fought under two flags. Now, I want to know if I am not correct in saying that a great many soldiers of the Mexican war who fought all through the civil war in the Confederate army are not now drawing pensions as Mexican soldiers?

Mr. PICKLER. Yes; all of them are.

Mr. LEWIS. Now, I know some of them individually, and I want to ask the gentlemen who are so patriotic and who are so much troubled here about men who fought under two standards, if they would vote for a bill striking from the pension rolls the names of Mexican soldiers who fought in the Confederate army and who are now receiving pensions?

Mr. MILES. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. LEWIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. MILES. Do you mean to say that those Mexican soldiers are to be classed with men who deserted their flag?

Mr. MAHON. They also deserted their flag at the beginning of the war.

Mr. MILES. Not at all; they deserted no flag.

Mr. LEWIS. I will answer the gentleman from Maryland. I say, as to men who fought under the Confederate flag and afterwards became loyal and fought under the flag of the Union, that one man of that class is as good as another [applause on the Republican side], and the man who fought in the Confederate army, possibly having got there under compulsion, as a great many did, and the man who conscientiously changed his views and became loyal and then fought for the flag of his country is as much entitled to consideration as a Mexican soldier who fought in the Confederate army, and as much entitled to the bounty of this Government. [Applause.] Now, Mr. Chairman, I have heard a good many times in this discussion the phrase "coffee cooler." I do not know what a coffee cooler is, and I would be glad if some of these patriotic gentlemen who use the term so freely would be good enough to define it, so that we may understand just what they mean by "coffee cooler." Who is the inventor of this expression "coffee cooler"?

Mr. MILNES. Grover Cleveland. [Laughter.]

Mr. LEWIS. Did it come from the same source as that other phrase, "innocuous desuetude"? [Laughter.] I want to say that the expressions "coffee cooler" and "bounty jumper" have, in my opinion, fallen into innocuous desuetude. We had no bounty jumpers or coffee coolers in Kentucky. The only sort of jumpers we had there were men who jumped over the enemy's works and jumped to the tops of the mountains and planted the Union flag there in triumph. [Applause.] The men who fought the battles of the civil war on the one side and the other were as brave and honorable as any in the country, and to my mind no such phrases can properly be applied to Union or Confederate soldiers. They are odious. And the time will soon come when the man who uses them as applied to the Union soldiers will be looked upon with the same contempt and scorn as one who would speak reproachfully or disrespectfully of the soldiers of the Revolutionary war, the war of 1812, or the Mexican war. The country cherishes its patriotic dead. The tumuli that cover their mortal remains are sacred spots to all good men and women. For their living comrades there should be no sentiment other than the broadest charity and warmest affection.

For them may springs in every desert flow,
All gentle spirits wait upon their words,
And every tree that o'er their path bends low
Have its faint flowers, its fruits, and singing birds.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to say any more upon this bill, and would not now but for the reason that I have been alluded to in person by several speakers in connection with the Southern soldier and my native State.

Mr. Chairman, while I am opposed to this bill and shall vote against every section of it, if the bill must pass I think the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] is a very good one. It puts all applicants for pension upon the common evidence that is received in all courts of justice. The whole bill is vicious and deceptive from beginning to end. And, Mr. Chairman, the discussion of this bill has taken a very wide scope, embracing all manner of partisanship as well as the merits and demerits of the Democratic and Republican parties, which is possibly somewhat of a legitimate range of argument; but, sir, when the subject of the reunions of Confederate veterans has been lugged into this debate by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HARDY], I think the proper limits of propriety have been transcended, as that is a matter entirely irrelevant and disconnected from this bill.

The gentleman alluded more particularly to a reunion lately held in Charleston, S. C., a gathering of as true, loyal, and brave men as ever assembled upon this or any other continent. The Southern soldiers, after following Lee and Jackson, Johnston and other leaders through four years of winter's snow and summer's heat, often half naked and hungry, after accomplishing all that human endurance and bravery could accomplish, after showing the world how half-naked and half-starved troops could put to flight an army better equipped and three times more in number, yielded to fate only when our flag went down upon the now historic field of Appomattox, they accepted the situation and surrendered when the immortal Lee said they should fight no more. The war with them was ended, they accepted their paroles, shook the hands of their comrades in silence as they looked for the last time over the hills of Virginia, dotted with the graves of the slain of both armies, and returned to their homes. But what did they find there?

In many parts of the sunny South they found their houses burned, their property gone, and all over the land was heard the cry like that of Rachel weeping for her children because they were not. Yet, amid all this destruction and devastation by the cruel hand of war, which had swept over the land with the crushing foot of a giant, they commenced life anew, and the fields that run red with blood in April were green with the harvest in June, and the horses that sniffed the battle in the spring under the saber (be it said to the honor of that grand and noble soldier, General Grant, for he magnanimously gave back to the boys their horses) were proudly walking before the plow in summer.

Then, as the years roll by, it is proper, it is natural, it is right, yea, it is more than right, that these old soldiers should meet together in their reunions to grasp each other again by the hand, to celebrate their trials, and live over again for the moment the life of the soldier. And it is unkind, it is unfortunate, it is improper and cowardly, to have their action adversely criticised here on the floor of the House in the discussion of a measure with which they have no connection except to pay their part of the burdens it may impose. Be this as it may, Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that while these men of the South are as true and as loyal to the flag to-day as those of the North, and as ready to fight for its defense, at the same time they will continue to have these reunions as long as time itself shall last. Yes, sir; as long as the sun shines by day and the moon gives her light by night, as long as the stars twinkle in the heavens, as long as the Potomac and the Shenandoah continue to flow, as long as the dewdrops fall upon the resting places of our dead and the Blue Ridge sentinels their graves, just so long will the men of the South meet together in reunions to commemorate the heroic deeds of her immortal soldiery in song and in story. [Applause.]

But let me say to this House that this is not done in any spirit of disloyalty to the Union of to-day. It is not done in any spirit of prejudice to the gallant and brave soldiers who fought on the other side, for I believe I voice the sentiment of every true Southern soldier when I say that with them the conflict of arms is over, the result accepted in good faith, and that now the soldiers of the South stand ready at all times to take by the hand the soldiers of the North, whom once they met in the red blaze of battle, now meeting over the chasm of sectionalism, ready and willing to bury forever the bloody spirit, and to plant upon its grave the white rose of peace, with the prayer that it may bloom perpetually, bringing forth fruit for the upbuilding and prosperity of this great nation of ours, with but one ambition, that we may forever remain a reunited, fraternal, and happy people. [Applause.]

Then it seems to me to be uncharitable in anyone to criticize the Confederate soldier for his love for the lost cause, for while he stood by the Southern cross, with more than filial affection, until it went down, he believed he was right, and that his quarrel was made upon a principle quarried from the mine of everlasting truth; and so he loves it still and will continue to love it till death. While the flag under which he fought is furled and put away forever, and while we are all reunited under the Star-spangled Banner, we feel that if we are to respect that flag and fight for it, which we are willing to do if necessary, its folds should wave gently over the graves of our dead and the forms of our living. That is Southern sentiment as I now understand it, and what is sentiment but patriotism itself? What is sentiment but principlerefin? What is it to-day that controls the universe?

Sir, from the time that Joseph carried the embalmed body of his father back from Egypt to Canaan to bury it in a cave in the field of Machpelah sentiment has ruled the world. What was it but divine sentiment that led Joseph, the honorable counselor, to go to Pilate to beg the body of his Lord that he might wrap it in fine linen and bury it in his own tomb where never laid any other body—new, nice, and clean? It was sentiment.

What was it but a similar sentiment that led that devoted woman to break the alabaster box of ointment and anoint the head of her Lord? And when it was suggested by some one in the crowd of a mercenary turn of mind (possibly like the fellow who injected this subject into this debate) that it might have been sold and given to the poor, He said, "Let her alone; she has done what she could; and whenever and wherever in all lands and countries My gospel is preached, let this be told as a memorial of her."

What was it that led those devoted women to be last at the cross and first at the sepulcher? It was sentiment. Then do not impugn the motives of our people for their devotion to their own sunny South and their devotion still to the lost cause. What is it that fosters your fondest memories around the place of your birth? The old schoolhouse, the old oaken bucket, even, that hung in the well, and even the old garden gate. Sentiment makes us respect the living and leads us on in our pilgrimage, to give decent burial to the dead, to strew flowers upon their graves, and to mark their resting places with monuments as enduring as marble and as lasting as brass.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let me say, in conclusion, that no amount of diversion can divest this bill of its vicious tendencies or relieve it from the appearance of humbuggery. It is a delusion and a snare, with no merit at all in it, and I hope it will be overwhelmingly voted down. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MILLIKEN. Mr. Chairman, I have the highest respect for the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TALBERT]. He is opposed to the increase of pensions, and he has the courage to honestly state to this House his convictions. I have no criticism to make on account of his affection for his old comrades, for "blood is thicker than water," and I am glad to see every man feel an affection for those with whom he has labored and suffered. But how is it with our friends generally on the other side? I have seen pension bills considered in this House for a good many years. The same opposition comes each time. Our friends on the other side say they are in favor of doing everything for the old soldier; they stand up, as my friend from New York did the other day, and urge that the Democratic party is a better friend to the Union veterans than the Republican party; but one thing you will observe, Mr. Chairman, they always find some reason why the pending bill should not be enacted. Why, sir, my friend from New York offered a bill last week as a substitute for the pending bill. He knew his substitute could not pass this House. It was intended only as a club with which to knock in the head the bill that is pending.

Gentlemen on the other side of the House are ever ready to asseverate with great emphasis and much patriotic display that they very earnestly favor pensioning the "real soldier," the "brave soldier," the "soldier that did honest service." But when you come to reduce their propositions down to their real intent and meaning you will discover in every instance that they do not mean anybody that is included in the bill before the House, let that bill be of whatsoever character it may. The fact is that we meet with opposition from the other side on all important bills which are presented and considered here for increasing the pensions of the soldiers or to facilitate the allowance of pensions under existing law. Each man has his particular excuse for his opposition. It may be one thing with one man and another thing with another; but it always comes from the Democratic side of the House, and it always has to be met by the Republicans.

I repeat that I honor the gentleman from South Carolina for standing up here like a man and having the courage to say squarely that he is opposed to the increase of pensions, unlike most of our friends on the other side, who claim to be really aching in their hearts to increase the old soldiers' pensions and facilitate their allowance, but who can never bring their minds to support any measure for that purpose which is being considered and has the least chance of being enacted into law.

Why, sir, I have stood here many a time and heard the Union veterans called "coffee coolers," and "bummers," and all that class of pet names. But, Mr. Chairman, I am proud of one fact—and it is recognized by this country, too—that all these insults to the soldiers, these attacks upon their characters, these slanderous words, as unjust as they are infamous and indecent, have never come from the Republican side of this House. [Applause.]

Sir, I have been here for thirteen years; I have heard all the debates on this subject during that time; and when gentlemen stand up here and claim that the Democratic party, as represented on this floor, has been the friend of the soldier, they have the "gall" and the assurance to deny the absolutely established facts of history; history with which the people of this country are too familiar to allow themselves to be deceived by such false and absurd assertions.

I favor the passage of the bill before the House because I am satisfied that it will secure a more speedy adjustment of pension claims than can be reached under the present law. And this I regard as a consummation most devoutly to be wished.

A great majority of the veterans of the Union armies are becoming old men. In the ordinary course of nature we can hardly expect for them many more years of life. If we would have the Government confer upon them a just recognition of their services we must provide that it be done soon, or it will not be done in this world.

Thousands of them are now waiting, suffering, for the relief which their gallant services entitle them to, with very little prospect of receiving it in time to do them much good.

As their age advances their infirmities increase. Many of them who came out of the Army buoyed up by the vigor and elasticity of youth find themselves debilitated, decrepit, suffering, and unable by their labor to earn the comfortable livelihood which they, above all others, most richly deserve.

Each year and month finds them less able to support themselves and those depending upon them than the year and month before. Time, which finally depletes the powers of all men, is sapping the vitality of the veterans of the Union armies more than any others. It is developing the effects of the hardships and sufferings of war and the infirmities caused by life in the camp, on the march, and in battle.

Their wounds are, many of them, sorer to-day and their diseases incurred in their military service have grown worse than they were on the day of their discharge from the Army.

These men must very soon receive the Government's aid in granting them just and well-deserved pensions or become dependent upon charity for support, and I do not believe that any brave and worthy soldier should be driven to be a beggar or made to enter the portals of the poorhouse. [Applause.]

This great nation, cramped as it is in its resources by the wretched economic policy of the party in power, is still amply able to properly care for those who in the day of its danger saved it. They gave the vigor of their young manhood to its defense. With unsurpassed courage they clung to it and supported it. They came home not to make excuses for defeat. They accomplished their patriotic mission. They brought back the flag of their country vindicated, its cause triumphant, its integrity complete. The nation can not afford in the smallest measure to neglect them. It would be a shame and a stain upon its escutcheon which could never be eradicated.

I favor this bill, because it will confirm the soldier in his pension so that the law may not be so administered as to deprive him of it. I doubt not that there will be rulings and rulings in the Pension Office so long as that Bureau shall exist. But I would make the law so definite and conclusive, I would shut the legal door so tight, that no ruling not made in direct and clear violation of law should deprive any old soldier of fairness and justice.

He should not live in constant fear that the benefits righteously conferred upon him by the Government might at any moment be taken from him by some caviling pension inspector, perhaps once a member of the rebel army, who either in order to show himself to be earning his salary, or from hatred of the Union soldier, or from total depravity should report to the Pension Bureau against him.

He should hold his pension after submitting to all the examinations and furnishing all the testimony necessary to secure it by some stronger tenure than the whims, the caprice, the hostility, or the self-interest of anyone.

This is my position, and it is the policy of the Republican party.

The gentleman from South Carolina sought, a few days ago, to sustain his position against the further allowance of pensions by comparing the amount paid out each year by our Pension Bureau with the cost of maintaining the armies of some of the great nations of Europe. Did it never occur to him that the waste caused by taking the young men of France, Germany, and Russia from the fields of production and making them only destroyers and consumers is much greater than the expense of supporting them in the army? Would the gentleman have us adopt the European system of keeping great standing armies? Does he not think that this nation is much richer, as well as better, for retiring her armies at the end of her wars and pensioning the wounded and disabled than she would be under the military system of the Old World, where the young men who should be pursuing civil avocations and promoting their country's progress and greatness by the exercise of their genius and energy are drafted from their communities to become idlers or destroyers? I believe, Mr. Chairman, in the military system of my own country, as I believe in its economic system.

My friend asks if we shall turn the United States Treasury over to the old soldiers. No. They do not ask or want it. What they want and should have is that they and their immediate dependents shall not be allowed to suffer in their old age by the neglect of the country whose life they offered their own lives to save.

But if the Treasury were to be depleted I much prefer it should be done in paying pensions to the veterans of the Union armies to having its contents sent across the ocean to foreign lands, to purchase what our idle thousands would be glad to produce, as has been done by the free-trade policy of the party now in power.

There was no depletion of the Treasury, no failure to meet our expenditures with our revenues and have a large margin to pay our debts with while the party which stands by and sustains the soldiers held the reins of government. [Applause.]

The gentleman from South Carolina beseeches us not to forget God, turn our backs upon Him, go out after false gods, and thus bring calamity upon us.

We forgot God and brought calamity upon the nation when we established and maintained human slavery. The Confederacy still further forgot God and more severely suffered when it waged war upon the Union to continue and extend that institution of iniquity. Let us not again forget God by refusing to provide ample comforts for the veterans of that brave Army which, in achieving victory for our country, became the architects of the nation's greatness and prosperity, and thus invoke upon ourselves another and perhaps greater calamity.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DINGLEY. I move that all debate upon the pending section and all amendments thereto be limited to one minute.

The motion was agreed to.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. HEPBURN, it was agreed to.

Mr. PICKLER. I ask unanimous consent that the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa, which has been adopted, be made section 18 of the bill.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York, Mr. SCRANTON, and others objected.

Mr. PICKLER. I move that it be made the last section of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. That motion is not now in order.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of line 12, page 1, insert the following:
And provided further, That the pension list may be a roll of honor for those brave soldiers who have borne the brunt of battle, there shall be kept a separate pension roll, to be designated the battle pension roll, upon which shall be inscribed the names of all soldiers who creditably served in battle, and the pension certificates given to such soldiers shall state the battles in which they engaged and the nature of the wounds which they received. And all soldiers now on the pension list who are entitled to the distinction shall be transferred to the battle pension roll and be given new certificates in conformity with the above-recited provision.

And a like certificate shall be given to the heirs of all deceased soldiers who, if living, would be entitled to such a certificate, and the names of said deceased soldiers shall be inscribed upon said battle roll."

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, I will reserve the point of order upon that.

Mr. WHEELER. I will explain it in a moment.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not debatable.

Several MEMBERS. Make the point of order now.

Mr. PICKLER. Very well. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order upon the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule upon it.

Mr. WHEELER. The gentlemen who have spoken upon this bill have repeatedly asserted that it is a roll of honor. Certainly all true friends of real soldiers will approve my amendment. It is—

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota makes the point of order, and the Chair is ready to rule upon it.

Mr. WHEELER. I ask unanimous consent to be permitted to proceed for five minutes.

Mr. PICKLER. Move to strike out the last word.

Mr. WHEELER. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the committee debate upon this portion of the bill has been already concluded—upon the section and all amendments to it.

Mr. WHEELER. I ask unanimous consent to proceed.

Mr. SCRANTON and others. Regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made.

Mr. FENTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Where a pensioner files a declaration alleging a new disability, and through ignorance or neglect fails to state that the disability for which he is already pensioned has increased in severity, and when the certificate of medical examination shows that such disability or disabilities have increased, the pension shall be increased accordingly, without reference to the medical report of the alleged new disability, and all such findings by medical boards of increased disabilities from pensioned cause shall be adjudicated for increase of pension.

Mr. PICKLER. I will reserve the point of order upon that. I would like to hear what the gentleman has to say about it.

Mr. STEELE. I make the point of order upon it.

Mr. FENTON. The reading of the amendment explains it—

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that all debate has been closed upon this paragraph of the bill and all amendments to it. The Chair sustains the point of order made by the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. TRACEWELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert in line 4, page 1, after the word "States," as follows: "Who enlisted in the Union Army prior to the 1st day of January, 1865."

Mr. PICKLER. I make the point of order upon that. We have passed beyond that section, or all debate has been limited upon it, and amendments are not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think that amendments are cut off.

Mr. PICKLER. I ask that the amendment be reported.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. PICKLER. I make the point of order. We do not want that confusing date. None of these men did enlist after that date—January 1, 1865.

Mr. TRACEWELL. Eighteen hundred and sixty-four should be the date in the amendment.

Mr. PICKLER. The gentleman should have made it 1864. It was read 1865. Does the gentleman want to amend it?

Mr. TRACEWELL. I intended it for 1864.

Mr. PICKLER. Oh, well, nobody enlisted after January, 1865. These men had all been up there in prison and enlisted in the Army, as I understand, before that date.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Indiana to offer an amendment to his amendment, if he so desires.

Mr. TRACEWELL. Then I move to amend, if necessary, by inserting "1864" in place of "1865" in the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PICKLER. How about the question of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the amendment is in order.

Mr. PICKLER. But the point is that there has been an amendment already adopted to that part of the bill, on motion of the gentleman from Iowa—

Mr. STEELE. The Chair has already decided the question, and I call for the regular order.

Mr. PICKLER. I have the floor now, if the gentleman from Indiana will just be patient for a little while.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota will state his point of order, if he desires to make one.

Mr. PICKLER. It is that it is too late now to offer an amendment to this part of the bill, as we have passed from this section. The debate was limited on the section and all pending amendments to it. The Clerk was about reading the next section of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order; and the question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. PICKLER. I desire to be heard upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that debate has been exhausted on this question.

Mr. PICKLER. This is a new amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. On the section and all amendments.

Mr. PICKLER. I hope this will be voted down. It only confuses things.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. What is the amendment? Let us have it read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the amendment.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. PICKLER. I move to amend by making it "April."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota moves to amend by substituting the word "April" in place of the word "January."

The question was taken on the amendment to the amendment; and on a division (demanded by Mr. PICKLER) there were—ayes 2, noes 48.

Accordingly, the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. TRACEWELL].

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 40, noes 52.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next section of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That from and after the passage of this act no pension heretofore granted or which may hereafter be granted under the pension laws shall be reduced or discontinued except for fraud, clerical error, mistake of fact, or recovery from disability: Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to entitle any person to more than one pension, or as allowing more than one pension for the same service, nor to affect or enlarge the pension rights of widows and others under sections 4702, 4706, and 4708 of the Revised Statutes of the United States and acts supplemental to and amendatory thereof.

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Insert in line 5, page 2, after the word "disability," the following: "Provided, No pension shall be suspended or reduced until such fraud, mistake of fact, or recovery from disability is established."

Mr. GRAFF. I offer this amendment because this section does not prevent the Commissioner of Pensions from suspending a pension upon which a hearing is pending. That is contrary to all law in any court, where rights of person or property are under consideration. It is one of the points in which the soldiers of this country are interested. If the examination into a pensioner's case is prolonged he may die and not receive the benefits of the pension.

Mr. PICKLER. I will ask that the amendment be again reported.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. PICKLER. That is the law now.

The CHAIRMAN. The hour and thirty minutes having expired the committee will, under the order of the House, rise and report the bill to the House.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PAYNE, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 8271) relating to pensions, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with an amendment, and with the recommendation that as amended the bill do pass.

The amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole was agreed to.

Mr. PICKLER. I believe it is the desire of the House that we take a vote on the bill now instead of to-morrow, and I ask unanimous consent that we do so. All gentlemen can place themselves on record to-morrow if they are not here now.

Mr. TALBERT. I would ask if the boys have come back from the horse race? [Laughter.]

Mr. PAYNE. I hope the previous understanding will be carried out.

Mr. PICKLER. I withdraw the request.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the interpretation of the rule would be that the question should be taken on the engrossment and third reading of the bill this afternoon, and the final vote on the passage be taken to-morrow; but he will listen to advice on the subject.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to ask if it is in order now to move an amendment by way of adding other sections to the bill?

The SPEAKER. It is not in order.

Mr. LEWIS. I misapprehended the rule. I gave notice on Saturday night that I would move an amendment. I understood that the bill would not be voted on until to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BARTLETT of New York) there were—ayes 113, noes 14.

The SPEAKER. The bill is ordered to be engrossed. Under the rule the vote on the final passage is postponed until to-morrow, after the reading of the Journal.

FREIGHT CHARGES ON VESSELS, ETC.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 6836) to amend section 2981 of the Revised Statutes, as amended by the act of June 10, 1880.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 2981 of the Revised Statutes be amended so as to read as follows:

"Sec. 2981. That whenever the collector of the port of entry of the vessel, or other proper officer of the customs, shall be duly notified in writing of the existence of a lien for freight, charges, or contribution in general average upon imported goods, wares, or merchandise in his custody, he shall, before delivering such goods, wares, or merchandise to the importer, owner, or consignee thereof for consumption, transportation, or exportation, give seasonable notice to the party or parties claiming the lien; and the possession by the officers of customs shall not affect the discharge of such lien, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe; and such officer shall refuse the delivery of such merchandise from any public or bonded warehouse or other place in which the same shall be deposited until proof to his satisfaction shall be produced that the freight, charges, or contribution in general average thereon has been paid or secured; but the rights of the United States shall not be prejudiced thereby, nor shall the United States or its officers be in any manner liable for losses consequent upon such refusal to deliver. If merchandise so subject to a lien, regarding which notice has been filed, shall be forfeited to the United States and sold, the freight, charges, or contribution in general average due thereon shall be paid from the proceeds of such sale in the same manner as other charges and expenses authorized by law to be paid therefrom are paid."

The Committee on Ways and Means recommended the adoption of the following amendment:

Insert in line 11, page 1, after the word "consumption," the following: "or to any vessel or vehicle for."

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask for an explanation of this bill. It seems to be important.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, the present law gives to steamship companies engaged in international trade a lien for freight even in the United States when in bond. The purpose of this bill is to extend that lien, not only to the freight of the transportation line, the ocean line, but also for advanced charges for freight for transportation from the other side, and also for losses on general average. That is all there is in the bill. The bill is reported unanimously from the Committee on Ways and Means, and also recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury in its present shape.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Is it for the benefit of the steamship companies?

Mr. PAYNE. It is for the benefit of the steamship companies, for the benefit of shippers, the benefit of those who advanced the freight, and also for the benefit of those whose goods are destroyed and are entitled to damage on general average.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to. The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. PAYNE, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

NORTH GEORGIA AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE.

Mr. TATE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 4921) to relieve the North Georgia Agricultural College from the payment of $450 for damaged gun.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the North Georgia Agricultural College, located at Dahlonega, in said State, be relieved from the payment to the United States of the sum of $450, for which said college has become liable on its bond by the destruction of a gun used in the military department of the same, it having been satisfactorily shown that the destruction of said gun by explosion was not the result of misuse or carelessness of any person connected with said college.

Sec. 2. That after the proper custodian of said bond shall have credited the same with the above sum of money, the Ordnance Department is hereby authorized and directed to issue to said college two pieces of artillery of modern make and necessary equipments for the use of said college, upon the return of the gun now in use, and such portions of the damaged gun or gun carriage now on hand, to such Government armory as the Ordnance Department may direct, without expense for freight to the United States Government.

The amendment recommended by the committee was read, as follows:

Strike out all of section 2.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I would ask the gentleman if there is a communication from the War Department?

Mr. TATE. No, sir. There is one from the commandant at the college. The War Department only states that they do not deal with this question; and I have a letter here asking the superintendent of the college to refer the matter to Congress. They make no recommendation whatever. The facts in the case—

Mr. DINGLEY. This is reported by a committee?

Mr. TATE. It is reported unanimously by the committee.

Mr. DINGLEY. Is it reported by the Committee on Military Affairs or by the Committee on Claims?

Mr. TATE. By the Committee on Military Affairs.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to. The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. TATE, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill passed was laid on the table.

FORT LEWIS RESERVATION, COLO.

Mr. BELL of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 5481) to restore the lands embraced in the Fort Lewis Military Reservation, in the State of Colorado, to the public domain.

The bill was read.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I reserve the right to object.

Mr. SCRANTON. I object.

GEORGE W. FREEMAN.

Mr. MILNES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5280) for the relief of George W. Freeman.

The bill was read.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I reserve the right to object.

The SPEAKER. Is objection made?

Mr. MILNES. I would like to explain this case.

The SPEAKER. When bills are presented subject to unanimous consent the House ought to pay attention quite as much as at any other time. The Chair hopes, if the House is to go on with business in this way, that there will be order, because the responsibility rests upon every gentleman present.

Mr. SCRANTON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

CONDEMNED CANNON.

Mr. STEPHENSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 6256) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Navy to furnish to George F. Fuller Post, Grand Army of the Republic, of Manistique, Mich., a condemned cannon.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to furnish to George F. Fuller Post, No. 257, Department of Michigan, Grand Army of the Republic, of Manistique, Mich., a condemned cannon: Provided, That said post shall transport said cannon free of cost to the Government of the United States.

The amendment recommended by the committee was read, as follows:

In line 7 strike all out after the word "Provided," and insert the following: "That in the judgment of the Secretary of the Navy such article can be spared without detriment to the public interests: And provided further, That the United States shall not be subjected to any expense on account of such donation."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Is a motion to amend that by adding cannon for another post admissible at this time?

The SPEAKER. It is not admissible if the point of order is made.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I move to amend that bill by adding to the bill two condemned cannon for Custer Post, Erie, and two for the James D. Clark Post.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will send up his amendment.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I object to the bill.

The SPEAKER. The amendment must be reported to the House first. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I have objected to all of these cases. I think there ought not to be a coupling of two bills. Now, I have no objection to the original bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the original bill?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I have no objection to that.

There was no objection.

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. STEPHENSON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

WILLIAM GRAY.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 953) for the relief of William Gray.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to issue to William Gray, late a private in Company D, First Regiment of New York (Lincoln) Cavalry, a warrant for the sum of $174.43, in full for his claim heretofore allowed by the Treasury Department, and for which claim the said Department issued to said William Gray Treasury pay warrant No. 3960, dated September 20, 1865, which warrant was paid on a forged indorsement of the name of said claimant without his authority or knowledge, and for which he has never received any return or benefit, and said resound warrant shall be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I ask for the reading of the report.

Mr. CONNOLLY. I will say to the gentleman that this bill was up for consideration before, and he investigated it then. It was where a draft was paid on a forged indorsement.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I recollect the gentleman from Illinois spoke to me about such a bill.

Mr. CONNOLLY. The report was read at that time.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I have not investigated it.

Mr. CONNOLLY. The report was read at your request before, and all objections were withdrawn. Finally the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Cox] objected, and that objection is withdrawn. Mr. BARTLETT of New York. The amount is so small I shall not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CONNOLLY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

CONDEMNED CANNON.

Mr. GRAFF. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 4324) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to deliver one condemned cannon to the city of Elmwood, Peoria County, Ill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to deliver to the city of Elmwood, Peoria County, Ill., 1 piece of condemned cast-iron cannon and 30 cannon balls, for use of said city: Provided, That said delivery shall be made without expense to the United States Government: And provided, That said delivery of said cannon can be made without detriment to the said naval service.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. GRAFF, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

JOHN McLAIN, ALIAS MICHAEL McLAIN.

Mr. BURRELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 8037) for the relief of John McLain.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of John McLain, alias Michael McLain, late a member of Company D, Tenth Illinois Infantry, and Company I, Thirteenth Missouri Cavalry, and grant him an honorable discharge, as of date October 22, 1864, the date he suffered an amputation of his left arm by reason of gunshot wounds received while engaged with his command against the enemy, at the battle of Independence, Mo.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I reserve the right to object, and ask for the reading of the report.

The report (by Mr. GRIFFIN) was read in part, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8037) for the relief of John McLain, having considered the same, report the annexed substitute therefor, and recommend the passage of said substitute.

The War Department report shows that it appears by the official record that John McLaine (also borne as John McLain) was enrolled on August 15, 1861, for three years, mustered in as a private of Company D, Tenth Illinois Volunteers, on September 16, 1861, and properly accounted for until April 30, 1862, when reported to have deserted at Cairo, Ill. His name is not borne on the rolls or returns of his company and regiment after that date; that in his sworn statement of January 9, 1864, subscribed by mark as John McLain, he states that when his regiment (the Tenth Illinois Volunteers) came up the river about April 30, 1862, and touched at Cairo, Ill., he procured a pass from his captain to go on shore to obtain tobacco; when he returned the boat had left and gone up the river, its destination to him unknown; that he then went to St. Louis, Mo., and there joined Company I, Fifth Missouri Cavalry, in which regiment his brother Hiram was serving; that after having at first stated and restated that he enlisted under the same name in this regiment, a name which could not be found on the records thereof, he finally admitted that he changed his name to Michael, fearing that he might be punished for desertion.

The official record shows that Michael McLean was enrolled July 10, 1863, at St. Louis, Mo., for three years, as a private in Company I, Fifth Missouri State Militia Cavalry. He was transferred to Company I, Thirteenth Missouri Cavalry, reenlisted in that organization on August 16, 1864, and deserted March 16, 1865, from furlough granted him February 8, 1865.

With respect to his service in the latter regiment, the soldier alleges in his affidavit, presented to the War Department, that while in action with his company at Independence, Mo., on October 22, 1864, his left arm was shot through and amputated the same day by Dr. Cundiff, regimental surgeon (Dr. Cundiff was surgeon of that regiment), and that he was also wounded in the right wrist in the same battle; that he was sent to hospital at St. Louis, where he remained a few days, perhaps ten days, when, being anxious to see his family, he went home and never returned, because he thought he could never be of any further service to the Government in his maimed condition. Though this man's company was in action at Independence, Mo., on October 22, 1864, having one man (John W. Sullivan) severely wounded in bowels, this statement is wholly incompatible with the official record, which shows that on the muster of October 31, 1864, he was on detached service as a wagoner; present for duty on the muster of December 31, 1864, and up to February 8, 1865, when he received a furlough from which he never returned, as already set forth.

The application for removal of the charge of desertion standing on records of Company D, Tenth Illinois Volunteers, was denied on the ground that the case is not covered by the act of Congress approved May 17, 1866, as the absence between desertion and reenlistment exceeded three months; the enlistments in the Fifth and Thirteenth Missouri Cavalry having been made in violation of the twenty-second (now fiftyth) article of war, his services in those organizations are not recognized by the War Department.

Applying for a certificate in lieu of lost discharge to the War Department, John M. McLain is stated to have declared May 12, 1892, that he served faithfully until about October, 1864, when he was wounded at Independence, Mo., where his arm was amputated; that he was sent to Hickory General Hospital, St. Louis, Mo., and there remained one night, when he went home and never returned, being no longer fit for military duty.

Under date of May 30, 1892, he testified that he served in Company D, Tenth Illinois Infantry, under the name Michael McLain, until he enlisted in the Thirteenth Missouri Cavalry; that while serving in the latter organization he lost his left arm and had his right hand crippled, unfitting him for manual labor of any kind, and rendering him unable to support his family.

The War Department reports that no record has been found that the soldier was wounded as alleged, or that he was at any time injured while serving in the Thirteenth Missouri Cavalry. On the contrary, it appears that he was present with his company up to the date on which he is reported as having deserted, viz, March 16, 1865.

The application for the removal of the charge of desertion has been repeatedly denied by the War Department, and now stands so denied, on the ground that the period embraced between the date of the soldier's desertion from the first organization and that of his enlistment in the second exceeded four months; that it has not been established that he was prevented from completing his term of enlistment in the second organization by reason of disability contracted in the line of duty, and because the case does not come within any of the other provisions of the act approved March 2, 1889.

A favorable report was made upon a similar bill by the Committee on Military Affairs, House of Representatives, at the first session of the Fiftyth Congress. With regard to the discrepancy in the name of McLain, your committee finds from the evidence submitted to it in this case, in addition to that reported by the War Department, that a brother of John McLain, by the name of Preston H. McLeane, sometimes known as Hiram McLain and Hiram P. McLain, also served in Company I, Fifth Missouri State Militia Cavalry, and who was also transferred to the Thirteenth Missouri Cavalry, from which he was discharged as Hiram P. McLeane. This testimony further shows—as bearing upon the discrepancy presented by the War Department report, with reference to the engagement of the command in action at Independence, Mo., on October 22, 1864, in which it is claimed that John McLain's statement as to his being in the charge on that day is totally incompatible with the official record, stating that he was on detached service as a wagoner—that the two names have been confused, and that it was Hiram P. McLain who was detached as a wagoner at the time of the battle.

This contention is also supported by the affidavit of Dr. W. H. H. Cundiff, whom the War Department reports was the surgeon of the Thirteenth Missouri Veteran Volunteer Cavalry at the time of the charge made by that regiment at Independence, Mo., on the 23d day of October, 1864, which affidavit was made on the 8th day of September, 1893, in which he states that on or about the day of that charge he was called to see John McLain, who had just been wounded by a gunshot wound in right wrist and left arm above elbow joint; that the wounds were fresh and had, in his opinion, just been received while engaged in a charge upon the rebels, then commanded by Gen. Sterling Price; that the arm was badly shattered above the elbow, so much so that he deemed amputation positively necessary to the well-being of the soldier; that he had no personal acquaintance with the soldier prior to being called to dress his wounds; that he was then told by his officers that his name was John McLain, and that he was a member of Company I, Thirteenth Missouri Veteran Volunteer Cavalry; and that he left after the amputation was performed and the stump dressed; that he also dressed his right wrist, and that he left said soldier in a temporary hospital at Independence, Mo., on the 23d of October, 1864, and that as he was compelled to accompany the troops as brigade surgeon, he knew nothing of what became of the soldier since the amputation save through information received.

This statement is corroborated by one Perry Twitchell, in an affidavit made January 13, 1897, in which he states that he was well acquainted with Michael McLain, who was a private in Company I, Fifth Missouri Cavalry, Missouri State Militia; that he was orderly sergeant of that company; that he was appointed sergeant-major of the Thirteenth Missouri Volunteer Cavalry, and that said Michael McLain was a private in Company I of said regiment; that said Twitchell was afterward appointed second lieutenant of Company I, Thirteenth Missouri Cavalry, in which Michael McLain was a private. On October 22, 1864, between 2 and 4 o'clock in the afternoon, the Thirteenth Missouri Cavalry led a charge into the town of Independence, Mo., capturing a battery in the streets of the town; that Company I was among the advance, and that Michael McLain received a gunshot wound in the left arm, which was afterwards amputated by Dr. Cundiff, regimental surgeon, above the elbow, and he also received a severe wound in the right wrist; that it was while on duty in the said engagement that Michael McLain received the wounds above described, and that he was taken to a temporary hospital, and that after afterwards learned that he was taken to a hospital at St. Louis, Mo.; that he never returned to his regiment for duty, as he was entirely disabled and not able to do anything; that he had a vivid recollection of all the facts stated when the affidavit was made.

Notwithstanding the failure of the records of the War Department to show that this soldier was in the engagement of October 22, 1864, at Independence, Mo., your committee is satisfied that the evidence presented sufficiently establishes the fact. There has also been presented to your committee a photograph of the soldier, verified so as to establish his identity, which shows the left arm amputated near the shoulder, and the right hand and wrist in a disabled condition.

Upon a careful review of all the testimony your committee find that the identity of John McLain and Michael McLain has been fully established as one and the same person, and that John McLain is his proper name; that having obtained leave at Cairo, Ill., to leave the transport to visit the city, from his superior officer, and, upon returning, finding the transport gone, shows no intention to abandon his command or desert the service at that time; that his subsequent enlistment at St. Louis, and his continuous service until he was completely disabled for further service also negatives any deliberate or willful intention to desert; that the amputation of his left arm at Independence, Mo., on October 22, 1864, and the injury to his right hand and wrist from wounds received in the charge mentioned, so completely disabled him as to justify the belief on his part that he was no longer fit for service, and that he might as well remain at home as to return to his command.

Conceding that it was the soldier's duty, in the first instance of desertion, to have reported to the nearest provost-marshal for orders, yet in view of the fact that the evidence submitted shows that the soldier was not well informed in such matters, he being unable to write his name even at the present day, your committee believe that the services which he rendered his country thereafter, in the performance of which he became maimed and crippled for life, sufficiently justifies the granting of the relief now applied for.

Your committee therefore recommend the passage of the following substitute:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of John McLain, alias Michael McLain, late a member of Company D, Tenth Illinois Infantry, and Company I, Thirteenth Missouri Cavalry, and grant him an honorable discharge as of date October 22, 1864, the date he suffered an amputation of his left arm by reason of gunshot wounds received while engaged with his command against the enemy at the battle of Independence, Mo.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York (during the reading). Mr. Speaker, I am satisfied—

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, as I have understood the reading of this report as far as it has been read, this man has two charges of desertion against him. He makes an allegation that he lost an arm at the battle of Independence, but the hospital records show that he was not engaged there, and there is no record of his being engaged there. He states that he lost his arm and went to the hospital and remained there one night, and then went home. From my understanding of the part of the report that has been read, I should not think that I was doing my duty if I should allow so palpable a case of desertion—double desertion—to pass through this House by my consent. Unless I can hear something more in justification of this bill, I must object.

Mr. BURRELL. I think I can satisfy the gentleman by the testimony of the surgeon of the regiment, Dr. Cundiff, and I send his affidavit to the Clerk's desk to be read.

Mr. VAN HORN. Mr. Speaker, I know nothing about the facts of this case, but the battle of Independence was fought in my county. I know that the battle took place, and I know Dr. Cundiff, the surgeon. I have known him for forty years. He is as reputable a man as there is in the State of Missouri, and there can be no doubt about the facts being as he states them.

The affidavit was read, as follows:

STATE OF MISSOURI, County of Cass, ss:

Personally appeared before me, the undersigned, a notary public for and in the State and county aforesaid, W. H. H. Cundiff, M. D., &c., who, after being duly sworn by me, makes the following statement:

That I am 50 years of age and a practicing physician and surgeon in the town of Pleasant Hill, Cass County, Mo., and was surgeon of the Thirteenth Missouri Veteran Volunteer Cavalry on the 2d day of September, 1864, to the 4th day of September, 1865. And that while acting in that capacity on or about the 23d day of October, 1864, at Independence, Mo., I was called to see one John McLain, who had just been wounded by a gunshot wound in right wrist and left arm above elbow joint. The wounds were fresh and, in my opinion, had just been received while engaged in a charge upon the rebels, then commanded by Gen. Sterling Price. The arm was badly shattered above the elbow, so much so that I deemed amputation positively necessary to the well-being of the said soldier. I had no special acquaintance with said soldier prior to being called to dress his wounds. Then I was told by his officers that his name was John McLain, and that he was a member of Company I, Thirteenth Missouri Veteran Volunteer Cavalry. I left after the amputation was performed and the stump dressed; I also dressed his right wrist. I left said soldier in a temporary hospital at Independence, Mo., on the 23d day of October, 1864. As I was compelled to accompany the troops as brigade surgeon, I know nothing of what became of said soldier since the amputation, save through information received. I have no interest in the prosecution of this claim, nor am I related to said John McLain to my knowledge.

W. H. H. CUNDIFF, M. D., A. E.

Mr. LOUD. What is the date of that affidavit?

Mr. BURRELL. April 21, 1896.

Mr. LOUD. The records of the War Department showed that this man's regiment was not engaged in that battle at all.

Mr. BURRELL. Mr. Speaker, there is another affidavit that I should like to have read, the affidavit of Lieutenant Twitchell.

The affidavit was read, as follows:

BRADFORD, ARK., January 17, 1897.

This is to certify that I was orderly sergeant in an independent company of cavalry known as the Schofield Hussars, and attached to the Fifth Missouri Cavalry, Missouri State Militia, as Company I. Michael McLain was a private in said company. We both reenlisted in the Thirteenth Missouri Cavalry, being together over two years up to that time. I was well acquainted with Michael McLain. I was appointed sergeant-major of the Thirteenth Missouri Veteran Cavalry, and Michael McLain was a private in Company I of said regiment. I was afterwards appointed second lieutenant of Company I, Thirteenth Missouri Cavalry, in which Michael McLain was a private.

On October 22, 1864, between 3 and 4 o'clock in the afternoon, the Thirteenth Missouri Cavalry led a charge into the town of Independence, Mo., capturing a battery in the streets of the town. Company I, Thirteenth Missouri Cavalry, was among the extreme advance. Michael McLain received a gunshot wound in the left arm, which was afterwards amputated by Dr. Cundiff, our regimental surgeon. It was amputated above the elbow. He also received a severe wound in the right wrist. It was while on duty in this engagement that Michael McLain received the wounds above described. He was taken to a temporary hospital, and I afterwards learned he was taken to a hospital at St. Louis, Mo. Michael McLain never returned to his regiment for duty, as he was entirely disabled and not able to do anything. I have a vivid recollection of all the facts as here stated. I am 43 years of age and work on public works, mostly railroad bridges. I am not related in any way to the applicant.

PERRY TWICHELL.

Mr. LOUD. Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to call the attention of the House to the condition in which we find ourselves in this case. The records of the War Department, as cited in the report, show that this man's regiment could not have been engaged in that battle, and we are here putting the affidavits of two parties against the records of the War Department. Either the report of the committee is radically wrong, or else there is something radically wrong in this case—one or the other. This affidavit states that Dr. Cundiff amputated this man's arm. But Dr. Cundiff does not make any such statement.

Mr. BURRELL. Yes, sir; he does.

Mr. LOUD. He simply makes the statement that he was there.

Mr. BURRELL. And he certifies that he amputated the man's arm.

Mr. BRUMM. I should like to ask whether the committee has investigated this matter.

Mr. BURRELL. Yes, sir; and has made a favorable report.

Mr. BRUMM. Is it not probable that this man was on detached service—that he was acting with a detachment of these troops.

Mr. LOUD. Oh, this last man swears that the company was engaged.

Mr. BRUMM. It was a very common thing for men to be on detached duty.

Mr. VAN HORN. Very common.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill, which was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BURRELL, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I call for the regular order.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I move that the House adjourn.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Pending the motion to adjourn, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. DRAPER, for ten days, on account of important business.

To Mr. BEACH, for five days, on account of important business.

To Mr. AVERY, for ten days, on account of important business.

The motion of Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE was then agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

Mr. PASCO presented a memorial of the legislature of the State of Florida, relative to the improvement of the Withlacoochee River; which was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A memorial to Congress of the United States asking an appropriation for the improvement of the Withlacoochee River.

Whereas the Withlacoochee River from Pemberton's Ferry to the Gulf of Mexico, a distance of 77 miles, traverses a section of country rich in agricultural and mineral resources, which fact is evidenced by the report upon the temporary survey of the War Department in the month of December, 1894, which report shows that 16 phosphate companies located along the line of said river annually mine an output of over 300,000 tons of phosphate, which said phosphate companies are now forced to pay $2.91 freight and terminal charges to Fernandina; and that 2 of the several saw mills on said river have a capacity of nearly 200,000 feet of cypress lumber per day; and that 70 of the several thousand orange groves on said river have an annual yield of over 130,000 crates of oranges; and

Whereas the deepening and improvement of said river would prove of incalculable value to the thousands of people along its banks, and be of incalculable advantage to the Government: Therefore

Be it resolved by the legislature of the State of Florida, That our Representatives in Congress be, and the same are hereby, requested to use all honorable means to secure an adequate appropriation to thoroughly and effectually accomplish the objects herein named.

Resolved, That the secretary of state be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish to each of our Representatives and Senators in Congress a copy of these resolutions.

Approved June 1, 1895.

STATE OF FLORIDA, Office of Secretary of State, ss:

I, John L. Crawford, secretary of state of the State of Florida, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true and correct copy of a memorial to Congress of the United States asking an appropriation for the improvement of the Withlacoochee River, as passed the regular session of the legislature of the State of Florida, 1895, and as filed in this office.

Given under my hand and the great seal of the State of Florida, at Tallahassee, the capital, this 24th day of April, A. D. 1895.

JNO. L. CRAWFORD,
Secretary of State.

Mr. PASCO presented a memorial of the legislature of the State of Florida, relative to the improvement of the entrance to Cumberland Sound; which was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Memorial to the Congress of the United States asking that the improvement of the entrance to Cumberland Sound be placed upon the list of continued appropriations.

Whereas the phosphate industry of Florida is now upon so extensive a scale of development that there is needed all the facilities of commerce for the increasing demand for export to foreign countries; and

Whereas the cost of export is largely dependent upon the depth of water which will enable vessels of the largest class to enter our ports; and

Whereas the bar entrance to the port of Fernandina, known as the entrance to Cumberland Sound, by the aid of appropriations by Congress, has already been greatly increased, and is now frequented by large vessels engaged in foreign commerce, and only needs to have the work of improvement more rapidly carried on, both for phosphate as well as lumber, naval stores, and other exports of great advantage to our people, as well as all parts of the United States:

Be it resolved by the legislature of the State of Florida, That our representatives in Congress be requested to urge upon the Congress of the United States to place the improvement of Cumberland Sound upon the list of continued appropriations, both as a measure of very great commercial importance to the interests of Florida and of the whole country, and more economical in every respect; and that the secretary of state be requested to send a copy of this preamble and resolution to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

Approved May 23, 1895.

STATE OF FLORIDA, Office Secretary of State, ss:

Mr. BURROWS, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2676) for the relief of Capt. John T. Bruen, of the State of New York, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7200) for the relief of A. T. Hensley, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2415) for the relief of B. J. Van Vleck, administrator of Henry Van Vleck, deceased, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

GREER COUNTY, OKLA.

Mr. TELLER. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7905) to establish and provide for the government of Greer County, Okla., and for other purposes, to report it favorably.

Mr. HILL. I suggest to the Senator from Colorado that he put the bill on its passage.

Mr. TELLER. I was about to ask, as it is a House bill and those people are without any government, that the bill be taken up and passed now.

Mr. HALE. Not to give rise to any debate?

Mr. TELLER. No; I think not.

Mr. HALE. If it leads to any debate I shall have to call for the regular order.

Mr. TELLER. If it gives rise to any debate I will withdraw it.

Mr. HALE. After it is disposed of I shall ask for the regular order.

The Secretary read the bill by title.

Mr. BATE. As the bill affects the rights of Texas and I know of no agreement about it, I wish to state that neither of the Senators from Texas is present, and as it is a matter of importance they might desire to be here. That is all I suggest. I see neither of them in his seat. I know nothing about any objections to the bill.

Mr. TELLER. I do not hear what the Senator from Tennessee says.

Mr. BATE. I say the bill affects the rights of Texas more or less, in relation to its boundaries, and neither of the Senators from Texas is present.

Mr. TELLER. There is a bill of the same character, introduced by the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. CHILTON].

Mr. BATE. He ought to be present when this bill is considered.

Mr. TELLER. The Supreme Court has decided all the questions concerning Texas, and there is no controversy on the subject.

Mr. BATE. That may be true, but there may be a question as to the adjustment of the line or something of that kind. I see neither of the Senators from Texas here. That is the only point I make. It is a matter of courtesy to them.

Mr. TELLER. I will say to the Senator from Tennessee that if when the junior Senator from Texas comes in he has any objection to the bill we will reconsider the vote. I suggest that he let the bill pass now.

Mr. BATE. All right.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill is reported with an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 1, line 22, after the word "shall," strike out the words "as soon as appointed."

Mr. TELLER. I ask that that amendment may be disagreed to. It is immaterial.

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHICKAMAUGA AND CHATTANOOGA NATIONAL PARK.

Mr. JONES of Nevada. I am directed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. PALMER] on the 14th instant, to report it without amendment.

Mr. PALMER. I ask for the present consideration of the resolution.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Dedication of the Chickamauga and Chattanooga National Park be, and it is hereby, authorized to expend the sum of $200 in the preparation of a map and illustrations for the full report of the dedication exercises, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

MARGUERITE SHANKLAND.

Mr. JONES of Nevada, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by Mr. QUAY on the 16th ultimo, reported it without amendment; and it was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay to Marguerite Shankland, daughter of Manning H. Shankland, deceased, late a clerk in the office of the Secretary of the Senate, a sum equal to six months' salary, at the rate allowed by law to said clerk, out of the "miscellaneous items" of the contingent fund of the Senate; said payment to be considered as in lieu of all funeral expenses or other allowances.

MRS. SARAH TAYLOR.

Mr. JONES of Nevada, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by Mr. ROACH February 5, 1896, reported it without amendment; and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay, out of the appropriation for miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate, to Mrs. Sarah Taylor, mother of James Taylor, deceased, late a Senate laborer, the sum of $300, being an amount equal to six months' salary as laborer aforesaid, the said sum to include all funeral or other allowances.

CLARA YEARGIN.

Mr. JONES of Nevada, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by Mr. IRBY on the 11th ultimo, reported it without amendment; and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay to Clara Yeargin, widow of John W. Yeargin, deceased, late a laborer of the Senate of the United States, a sum equal to six months' salary at the rate allowed by law to said laborer, out of the "miscellaneous items" of the contingent fund of the Senate, said payment to be considered as in lieu of all funeral expenses or other allowances.

C. F. LYNCH.

Mr. JONES of Nevada, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the following resolution, submitted by Mr. FAULKNER on the 27th instant, reported it without amendment:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to appoint C. F. Lynch a messenger, who shall be paid at the rate of $1,440 per annum from the contingent fund of the Senate, upon vouchers to be approved by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, until otherwise provided for.

Mr. FAULKNER. I merely wish to state to the Senate that this is the case of the employee of the Senate, a laborer, who was so seriously injured about three weeks ago by a fall while putting up the flag over the Senate wing of the Capitol. He has been lying at the point of death. It is very doubtful whether he will recover, but if he does it is anticipated that he will be paralyzed from his waist down. He has a large family and his expenses are exceedingly heavy upon him. I introduced the resolution to relieve him in some measure from the burdens that rest upon him by reason of this serious accident. I ask that the resolution be now put on its passage.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

JOSEPHINE FOOTE FAIRFAX.

Mr. GALLINGER. Some time ago the Senate passed a bill, Senate bill 1784, granting a pension to Josephine Foote Fairfax, the widow of the late Rear-Admiral Fairfax, at the rate of $50 per month. It went to the House of Representatives, and they have returned a House bill in identically the same terms and granting the same rate of pension. I am directed by the Committee on Pensions to report back favorably the House bill, being the bill (H. R. 3112) granting a pension to Josephine Foote Fairfax, and as a similar bill has once passed the Senate and it will take but a moment for its consideration, I ask unanimous consent that it be now considered.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Josephine Foote Fairfax, widow of the late Rear-Admiral Donald MacNeill Fairfax, of the United States Navy, at the rate of $50 per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

THE RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

On motion of Mr. FRYE, it was Ordered, That 800 extra copies of H. R. 7077 and report thereon, No. 790, be printed for the use of the Senate.

MONONGAHELA RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President—

Mr. QUAY. Before the Senator from Maine asks the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the appropriation bill, which he has in charge, I should be glad, with his permission, to have the unanimous consent of the Senate to pass a bill I hold in my hand, being the bill (H. R. 4781) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the Union Railroad Company to construct and maintain a bridge across the Monongahela River," approved February 18, 1893. It consists of only about eight or ten lines.

Mr. HALE. If it is not to give rise to debate, I will yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7064) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes; asked a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. CANNON, Mr. HAINES of Nebraska, and Mr. SATERS managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills:

A bill (S. 688) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Capital Railway Company," approved March 2, 1895; and

A bill (S. 1904) to regulate marriages in the District of Columbia.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7542) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill, the pending question being on the amendment reported by Mr. CHANDLER, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, on page 2, after line 23, to insert:

And provided further, That no payment shall be made from the appropriations in this bill to any officer in the Navy or Marine Corps on the active or retired list while such officer is employed, after June 30, 1897, by any person or company furnishing naval supplies or war material to the Government; and such employment is hereby made unlawful after said date.

Mr. BACON. By direction of the Committee on Naval Affairs I desire to offer an amendment, not to the pending amendment, but to a different portion of the bill, to come in on page 52. The purpose in offering it now is, as it relates to a very important feature of the bill, that it may be printed, so that Senators may have an opportunity to examine it before it comes up for consideration.

Mr. HALE. Let the amendment be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 52, after line 15, insert:

And provided further, That in case the Secretary of the Navy shall make separate contracts for the armor and armor plate for said battleships, he shall not accept bids at a rate exceeding an average of $500 per ton of 2,240 pounds; and in case the said Secretary can not make contracts for said armor and armor plate within said limit, he shall delay action and report the offers made to the next session of Congress.

Mr. HALE. The Senator offering the amendment proposes that it shall be printed. I suggest that the clerks see to it that it be sent at once to the Public Printer, so that it may be here this afternoon.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered.

Mr. HALE. I hope we may conclude the bill to-day.

Mr. GORMAN. It is a separate amendment.

Mr. HALE. It is a separate amendment, offered by the Senator from Georgia.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be printed as indicated.

Mr. PLATT and Mr. GORMAN. Let it be read once more.

The Secretary again read Mr. BACON's amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The pending question is on the amendment reported by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] from the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. GORMAN. I call the attention of the Senator from New Hampshire who offered the amendment to the fact that the amendment as it stands simply provides "that no payment shall be made from the appropriations in this bill to any officer in the Navy or Marine Corps on the active or retired list while such officer is employed, after January 1, 1897, by any person or company furnishing naval supplies or war material to the Government; and such employment is hereby made unlawful after said date." Of course it would compel any officer who desired to remain in the employment of one of these firms to resign from the Navy.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator will notice that the date is not right in the amendment as he reads it. He has the printed amendment. The time was changed by the direction of the committee to June 30, 1897, so that it gives officers who may be in employment of this kind a year from the 30th of June next to find other employment.

Mr. GORMAN. But the suggestion I made to the Senator yesterday was that the amendment confines its operations to the appropriations made in the pending bill. If the rule be a proper one to exclude the employment of retired officers by any firms outside, it ought to be made a permanent provision and not be confined to the appropriations in this bill, which would expire one year from the 1st of July next.

Mr. CHANDLER. The committee do not wish to do anyone injustice. I think we have no objection to making it apply to cases arising hereafter, if that will gratify Senators; but the Senator will notice that we can not put general legislation upon an appropriation bill, and that the only way sometimes in which reforms can be initiated is by limiting the appropriations by offering amendments that are not subject to the point of order. If I were to change the amendment in pursuance of the suggestion of the Senator from Maryland and make it simply a general provision of law, as soon as that change was safely completed the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] would perhaps rise and say the whole amendment is out of order. It is the first requisite to an amendment to have it in order.

Mr. GRAY. If I may be allowed, I will state that the latter clause of the amendment, as I heard it read just now, would seem to settle the whole matter so far as these officers are concerned by rendering such employment unlawful. No officer could stay in the Navy and have such employment in the face of that amendment.

Mr. CHANDLER. After that date. That is the expression.

Mr. GORMAN. I submit to the Senator from New Hampshire that it is general legislation as it stands.

Mr. CHANDLER. It is not general legislation to say that we will not make payment from the annual appropriations for the Navy to officers of the Navy who are in private employment, engaged in the service of contractors with the Government. That is an amendment which is entirely within the scope and limit of the power of amendment.

Mr. HALE. I suppose the Senator from New Hampshire drew the amendment with that in his mind, to avoid the point of order that would be raised otherwise. Did he not?

Mr. CHANDLER. The purpose in drawing the amendment was to make it a limitation of the appropriations made in this bill, because I know that if it was sought to put it in the form of general legislation upon the bill it would be objected to. I repeat, no reasonable limitation upon the expenditure of money in an appropriation bill is out of order, even if it changes an existing law. An appropriation made for a general purpose one year may be repeated in the next year's appropriation bill, and specific directions may be given how to spend that money. An amendment for that purpose is not out of order. If the Senator from Maryland will consent that that amendment may be passed over for the present I will examine the language of it; perhaps it can be put in a shape to satisfy him.

Mr. GORMAN. I have no objection to its being passed over.

Mr. HALE. We are right in the midst of the discussion upon this matter. Having the responsibility of the charge of the bill, I would rather that it would be followed up now, if there is to be any further discussion upon it, and that we should dispose of it, and then come to other matters which are perhaps of larger importance. The Senator from New Hampshire and the Senator from Maryland can come to an accord in this matter so far as they are concerned and fix the amendment while further discussion is going on. I object to its going over now and coming up again. Let the Senator put in the words "hereafter employed."

Mr. GORMAN. I move, then, to amend the amendment so as to read as follows:

That no payments shall be made from the appropriations by Congress to any officer in the Navy or Marine Corps on the active or retired list while such officer is employed, after June 30, 1898—

Mr. HAWLEY. That would be general legislation.

Mr. CHANDLER. June 30, 1897, is the date of my amendment.

Mr. GORMAN. I think the whole matter is general legislation. The last four words in line 8 are unquestionably general legislation:

And such employment is hereby made unlawful after said date.

That line is as much general legislation as the words "hereafter employed." If the point of order will hold at all, it will hold against the amendment as it now stands. The point I make is, if it is right, if the Naval Committee, after due deliberation, have come to the conclusion that we ought to exclude these officers on the retired list from this private employment, the rule ought to be general, and it ought to be made permanent, so that such officers may have notice of it.

Mr. HAWLEY. And immediately cut off those who have this employment?

Mr. GORMAN. That is the suggestion of the Committee on Naval Affairs; not mine at all.

Mr. HAWLEY. What would be the effect of the Senator's amendment to the amendment?

Mr. GORMAN. It would make the provision permanent. It would not only confine it to the present appropriation, but to all appropriations made by Congress.

Mr. HAWLEY. Do I understand that it would compel the discharge immediately of those two gentlemen?

Mr. GORMAN. After June 30, 1898—in two years.

Mr. HALE. June 30, 1897.

Mr. GORMAN. I understand that the Committee on Naval Affairs have concluded that the employment should not be cut off immediately, in view of the fact that it was perfectly lawful to engage in the employment, that it was done with the knowledge of the Department. Indeed, in many cases, I understand, while this whole matter was being developed, the Navy Department, instead of discouraging it, encouraged the naval officers who were on the retired list to go into the private employment of these firms for the purpose of learning the manufacture from the beginning, because there was scarcely a naval officer who understood anything about it. The Department encouraged it, and it being not only the desire of the Department, but of the officers themselves, those two officers on the retired list ought not to be cut off immediately, if cut off at all. But if the rule is a proper one to apply to the pending appropriation bill, it ought to apply to all. That is the point I make.

Mr. CHANDLER. I suggest the following language:

And provided further, That no payment shall be made from the appropriations in this bill to any officer in the Navy or Marine Corps, on the active or retired list, while such officer is employed, after June 30, 1897, by any person or company furnishing naval supplies or war material to the Government, and such employment of any officer not now in such employment is hereby made unlawful after said date.

Mr. GORMAN. That will cover it.

Mr. HALE. That would allow officers who are now in the Navy—

Mr. CHANDLER. To continue—

Mr. HALE. To be employed after July. The Senator wants to fix that.

Mr. CHANDLER. That is the effect of the provision.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President—

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The modification submitted by the Senator from New Hampshire will be stated, and then the Chair will recognize the Senator from Florida.

The SECRETARY. Insert after the word "employment," in line 7 of the amendment, "of any officer not now in such employment"; so as to read—

Mr. SEWELL. I have been listening in vain to hear some good reason offered—

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] has addressed the Chair. The modification proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire will be first stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert after the word "employment," in line 7, the words "of any officer not now in such employment"; so as to read:

And such employment of any officer not now in such employment is hereby made unlawful after said date.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I think nothing illustrates more clearly the fact that there is no subject upon which there may not be great differences of opinion than the debate on the pending amendment. It seems that the company organized to furnish the steel armor for battle ships proposed a contract to the Government by which the Government should appoint a naval officer as an inspector for the purpose of determining the performance of a contract made with that company, and that the same company has further agreed, not with the Government, but in fact with another officer of the United States, a retired officer, that he shall have no kind of connection with the decision as to the performance of this contract by the company and no connection whatever with it; but that they will not only agree to take the inspector, the regular commissioned officer of the Navy, to decide on the fact of the contracts being satisfactorily performed, but will also employ in the execution of this contract another officer, who shall be subject to court-martial if he shall fail to perform his duty to the Government by concealing, while in the employment of the company, any defect in the completed armor.

Mr. HAWLEY. Let the Senator add, which officer is also absolutely idle under the law.

Mr. CALL. Well, that is true, but to this point it does not exactly relate. This company stipulates that the Government shall have, by a separate and distinct officer, an absolute protection in the preparation of the contract and in its execution, who shall inspect for the Government, subject in all respects to the discipline of the Navy, and that they will take another officer of the Government, a retired officer, having nothing to do with the Government in the performance of duty of any kind, receiving a pension only, but still bound by the discipline of the Navy, and subject to be court-martialed if he shall conceal any defect whatever in the armor when completed.

How is the Government of the United States injured by having a skilled officer, not in the employment of the Government, but subject to discipline and court-martial, if he shall conceal any defects? It seems a singular idea to me that objection should be made to this additional security for the performance of the contract, when the retired officer is not only bound by the esprit de corps of his profession, but he is bound by the penalty of a trial by court-martial for concealing or being guilty of any kind of collusion with the company in the performance of this contract. He has nothing to do with its examination, nothing to do with its acceptance by the Government, and it would be a high crime and a misdemeanor on the part of the superior officer of the Navy if he intrusted to anyone, to the regular commissioned officer, wholly removed from any connection with this Government, the approval of the contract. But the retired officer has nothing to do with it. The argument for this amendment is that the company are to stipulate by their agreement with the retired officer that his skill and his knowledge shall be utilized to deceive the Government, to give it incomplete armor, to give it armor in which there is a carefully prepared defect. This is not true; he is employed to see that the performance of the contract, so far as the company are concerned, shall be completely and fully in accordance with the stipulations made. That is the point of view in which the thing presents itself to me.

What is the argument? How can a retired officer affect injuriously the Government? It has been said by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] that he is familiar with the officers of the Navy. Admit it. Is that familiarity to cause the superior officers of the Navy to violate their duty to the Government? Is it to be assumed that because this officer is employed by a company to do what—to exercise his skill and judgment in the performance of his contract according to stipulations—that therefore the officers of the Navy will receive, either from favor, from association, or from some corrupt motive, some inducement to betray their duty? I see no conclusion of that kind. I do not see that there is any antagonism as presented by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] between the company and the Government of the United States. Such antagonism can only result through fraud. The interest of the company is to see that the contract is performed according to its stipulation, and that is the interest of the United States; and if you assume that fraud is going to intervene by the employment of an officer, bound under severe penalties not to do the thing which it is assumed he will do, namely, betray the Government, that is another proposition which has no foundation.

I think there is another and a greater objection to the amendment, not only that it is utterly impossible that the officer can do any injury to the Government because of this employment, not only because the officer of the Navy who is charged with the inspection and approval is just as much subject to corrupt influence without the employment of the retired officer as with the employment, but also because the Government of the United States is interested in having its officers the most accomplished and skilled men who can be had anywhere. How is that to be attained? Is an officer of the Navy to be accomplished in the manufacture and inspection of steel armor by being withdrawn entirely from employments connected with that art? Is that the way a retired officer of the United States Navy, who may become useful, is to become an accomplished man, by being isolated and prevented from all association with the business pursuits of men? Unquestionably that is not true. You want these officers to know all about the manufacture of steel armor. You want them to be conversant with the progress of art of every kind. You want them in the workshops, you want them employed in private pursuits, and there are other and superior and more powerful safeguards against their influencing the Government corruptly which can be used than that of excluding them from private employment of every kind.

I do not think it even expedient to suspend the pay of these officers while they are employed by private companies, in business which can have no kind of connection in influencing the determination of the Government. But if that be so, suspend them temporarily and strike from the amendment the provision that hereafter such employment shall be unlawful. Let the amendment stand that while in the employment of such companies the officers shall not receive any salary from the Government, but do not exclude them from their place and from pension in the service because temporarily they have devoted themselves to something which educates them for a higher degree of usefulness in the Navy.

Mr. President, I do not think there is any foundation for the suggestion that the Government will suffer because of the temporary or permanent employment of a pensioned officer in something with which the Government has no connection whatever, except having identically the same interest that the company has, the preparation to the highest standard of efficiency of steel armor or any other material which the Navy is required to use. That is so in this case. The interest of the Government and the interest of the contractors are the same. The contractor is bound to perform his work according to certain specified stipulations, and the interest of the Government is that he shall do it. The interest of the contractor is that he shall do it. Now, the assumption is that fraud is to intervene by employing a skilled officer of the Government, in the pay of the Government, subject to court-martial for concealing any defects by which the Government is injured.

Mr. SEWELL. Mr. President, I have not heard all of the arguments made in this matter. I do not believe that the Congress of the United States should deprive a retired officer of the opportunity of earning compensation outside, nor do I think you can properly draw the line as to what shall be the compensation, whether it shall be from any one branch of his profession or another, or by whom paid, or whether the party paying it shall be a contractor with the Government. We are all proud of the officers who have been educated both in the Navy and the Army, and I have yet to know of a case where they have disgraced the Government or themselves. The amendment looks to me very much like a provision to prevent a fraud which is not at all likely to exist as to officers who have been educated under the flag.

Unfortunately some of these gentlemen have been retired earlier in life than contemplated by reason of some deficiencies, one particularly, who has been employed in one of the steel-making foundries, for defection of sight. Here is one of the brightest young men in the country thrown on his beam ends, as you might say, by a defection over which he has no control, which was not brought about by any indiscretion on his part. He is educated up to the highest standard, and it is wholly wrong from my point of view to say that that young man, who probably gets a salary from the Government of $1,500—

Mr. HAWLEY. Nine hundred dollars.

Mr. SEWELL. Nine hundred dollars—shall be deprived of the right to exercise his brains and his education in providing for his family simply because he is an officer of the Navy. I think it is stigmatizing them as a class and that it ought not to be done.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, when the proposition was first made to prevent this kind of employment hereafter I thought there was a show of wisdom in it. The more I have thought of it the more I am unwilling to assent to it in any form. It is an extraordinary case taken altogether. There are two officers whom the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL] has referred to in appropriately high terms, men of great skill and high character, who happen to be now employed, one by the Bethlehem Iron Works and the other by the equally famous Carnegie works. Although they are getting but $900 each from the Government, and are excused by law from all naval duty whatever, and simply have the general allegiance of a naval officer, being subject to court-martial, it is proposed now to forbid them from doing any work whatever in a field for which they are specially qualified and a work that is of very great benefit to the Government. Is it supposed that they can live on $900 per annum apiece? Not at all. What shall they do? They are best qualified for this work, and in this case most eminently qualified. It is true there may be some great iron works in the country that might find use for them, but this is their natural home.

Now, singularly enough, it strikes these two men with the most severity. They are the men whom unmerciful disaster has followed fast and followed faster. One, who was retired because of a defect in his sight, went through the Academy and nobody discovered it. He served honorably for a great many years afterwards, and then a superserviceable doctor found that he had a little difficulty in distinguishing between red and green. That does disqualify him from being the officer on deck at night, but it does not take away his brains, nor is the sight defect, just now discovered, in any respect due to his vice or misbehavior of any sort. He is eminently a gentleman.

Now, there is the difficulty about it. In retiring him in this way, by some practice new to me, hitherto unknown so far as I have discovered, they found he was not to be retired honorably upon the full pay of his retiring rank, but on a half rate. If I am not mistaken, each of these gentlemen would be entitled, if retired in the ordinary way, to about $1,800 a year, upon which they could probably live with more or less comfort. A great many people live on less than that. But there seems to be some discredit attached to it. I am going to hunt up the records, and if I find them to be as I suppose, I shall present a bill for the correction of the gross injustice. Is an officer who is compelled to be retired by physical disability before the age of 63 therefore, in some respect on account of being disabled and retired before 63, to be set aside on half pay? If these gentlemen had fallen down and broken their legs, so far as I know they would have been entitled to be retired fairly upon the regular retiring rate which would come to them at the age of 63 if they were in perfect health.

Now, just think of this particular notion of cutting off these men—striking these two, the worst possible cases for its illustration. I do not want any such limitation. I have known something of this business and of many of these men. I have not only been interested from the beginning in the building of these great steel and iron works for making ordnance and material for building war ships, but the Senate some years ago did me the honor to make me chairman of a committee which investigated the whole subject. I went to some of the shops here and to many of the great establishments in Great Britain. So I have come to know about it, and I have in a manner fallen in love in the matter of the history of the thing. What I am about to say applies to some other remarks made on this subject as well as to the special question now under consideration. We did not know whether anybody in the United States was ready to make the enormous blocks of steel armor or to give us the various other forms of iron and steel necessary to build ships. It would have cost the Government an enormous sum to complete a plant for making armor and great guns. The question was whether there were any great establishments in the country ready to contract with the Government, partly on "spec," if you choose to call it so, and partly from patriotism, and to undertake to make all the parts of the great steel guns, rough hewn, rough bored, and rough turned, and turn them over to a Government shop, which had cost a good deal, which would finally finish and assemble the parts; and also whether there was any private party who would agree to make such armor as was wanted. That was the question.

We found upon going about the country that there were several gentlemen who would undertake it. I am bound to say it was not altogether a mere matter of dollars and cents; there was some patriotic pride in it. They said they would put down two, three, or four millions of dollars if necessary, $2,000,000 to begin with, for the plant. They wanted to be sure of contracts. They laid down perfectly honorable and fair terms in every respect, general conditions, which would form a part of a sound policy. The Government started upon that arrangement, getting the rough parts of the guns and the whole of the armor from private parties, and building some ships in Government yards and the rest of them largely in private yards.

I say the history of these concerns and of their improvement in the mechanic arts and of the beauty and skill with which they have improved upon everything of the kind abroad is a matter of American pride; just pride; and I am sorry when gentlemen seem to think that everything which they do has an odor of suspicious behavior about it and must be investigated and must be construed against their claim. I say they have done a grand work for us. The great iron and steel forgers and the great shipbuilders have made us proud of the American mechanic and proud of the naval officer who has been connected with them. What on earth can one of these comparatively young men—say 45 years of age; the Senate gets in the habit of thinking that is rather young—do in the way of corrupting the Government or defrauding it in any way? They are gentlemen of honor. They still are bound not only by the esprit de corps of the Army and the Navy, but by the severities of martial law. They are liable to be court-martialed, and Senators know how strict that is in the matter of the conduct of a soldier and a gentleman.

But these two particular officers, unjustly retired on half pay, after an honorable life of twenty or twenty-five years, are to be told to-day, now idle and not having enough to live on, "You shall not engage in the particular calling for which you are, above any in the United States, fitted." I am sorry the subject has been brought up in any shape, but if I can get nothing better to vote for than the suggestion of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] I shall vote for it, and then I shall vote against everything on the subject.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, it is very hard to pass any proposition through Congress which strikes at any individual or affects any individual. The individuals concerned make a rally; the friends of the individuals are appealed to, and they generally succeed in preventing the legislation which it is thought, by persons not specially interested in those individuals, advantageous for the Government.

This is not a question alone of these two young men—45 years of age—of whom the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] speaks. It is a question of an important principle in connection with the administration of the Government in the Navy Department. These two men are officers of the Navy. There is no earthly difference between them and any other officer of the Navy, except that they can not be ordered to duty unless in time of war, and they are on the retired list receiving half pay instead of full pay. These two men are thus employed under a system which is believed by the committee to be a vicious system, and we feel that we have a right to have a vote of this body upon the question of principle uninfluenced by considerations personal to the two men. They are to have, under the amendment, a year from the 30th of June next to find other employment, and the question is whether after that date the custom which contractors with the Navy Department—men receiving millions of dollars from the Government through the Navy Department—have inaugurated, of employing officers upon the retired list to serve them, shall at the proper time come to an end.

I submit that the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] overlooked entirely the fact that the whole world is open in which these men can seek employment other than employment under contractors with the Government. The Senator from Connecticut argued as though these two men would be obliged to remain idle all their lives if they were not allowed to go into the employment of contractors with the Government. Not at all, Mr. President.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Senator from New Hampshire will allow me to correct him. I did not quite say that. I did say that perhaps they could get employment in some of the other great steel and iron machine shops, but that this is the work for which they are more especially and finely fitted.

Mr. CHANDLER. Of course they can get employment elsewhere. These men were not educated as ordnance officers. They were not educated as constructors of steamships. They were not educated to fabricate guns or armor. The whole construction is recent in this country. They have had an education which fits them for almost any employment in private life, and it is not necessary, in order that they may spend the remainder of their lives usefully, that they shall be allowed to go into the employment of men who have contracts reaching into the millions of dollars with the Navy Department, and have the right to come here for those contractors and go through and through the Navy Department, to find out what is going on there, and what the views and purposes of the Government are, in order to serve their employers.

I certainly have refrained, and I know other members of the committee have refrained, from setting out the evil that is growing up in the language in which it might have been depicted. The aim of too many naval officers to-day is not to serve the Government faithfully, but to connect themselves for a little time with some of the new mechanical methods employed in furnishing war material for the Government to learn what they can, to learn enough to make themselves useful to outside contractors, and then to go out from the employment of the Government, either by leave of absence on the active list or by getting on the retired list, and make large sums of money which they do not see they can make as compensation for their services so long as they continue to serve the Government for their salaries. In view of the money that has been made by naval officers out of private employment, the service is being honeycombed by a desire to go out and do likewise, which is doing infinite mischief to the service.

Mr. GRAY. I will say to the Senator from New Hampshire, if he will permit me, that the cases with which we are dealing are cases where the officers were compelled to go out of the active service of the Navy and against their will to go on the retired list.

Mr. CHANDLER. That does not touch the principle, which is a sound principle and ought to be adopted by the Senate, that so long as they are officers of the Government, receiving salaries from the Government, they shall not go into the employment for high wages of contractors who are doing business by the millions of dollars with the Government. I will not say, as the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] did, that those contractors are enemies of the Government. I will adopt the word suggested by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY]. They are antagonists of the Government. We think that armor for the battle ships which we are going to build ought to be purchased for $350 a ton. The manufacturers want to get $550 a ton. That is the contention. That is the very question which we are to debate in the Senate within a few hours, and the committee have been endeavoring to learn all they can learn about it.

I say that in the consideration and the decision of that question, and in the carrying out of contracts that are made for armor, we do not want to have in the employment of the contractors naval officers educated by the Government, to-day paid a salary by the Government, using all their knowledge, all their wit, all their skill, to get $550 a ton out of the Government of the United States when the United States ought to pay only $350 a ton. Mr. President, forsooth—

Mr. GORMAN. Will the Senator from New Hampshire please explain to me—for I confess I do not understand the proposition—what special knowledge any retired officer would have because of his education at Annapolis and his connection with the Navy which would enable him in the slightest degree to increase to the extent of a farthing the contract price for armor? I do not understand it, and I should like the Senator, who is familiar with the Navy Department, to explain how it can possibly be.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will only bring to the attention of the Senator from Maryland the case as presented by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY]. He says we should take young naval officers, familiarize them with the manufacture of armor and guns and the construction of ships, educate them at our expense, employ them at the public expense until they are thoroughly expert in the business, and when they go upon the retired list we should allow them to go into the service of contractors with the Government for that kind of material. I say it is injurious to the Government to inculcate the idea that naval officers are to be on the lookout all the time for an opportunity, if by any possibility they can get upon the retired list or if they can find it more profitable to leave the Navy than to stay in it, to make fortunes by using the skill and knowledge and ability which have come to them while in the Government service in the employ of contractors who are engaged in doing business with the Government.

I know a naval officer who was examined for promotion and had a physical defect, but the naval surgeons found that the defect did not stand in the way of his promotion, and he was promoted to higher rank on the active list. He went abroad in an important capacity for the United States. A little later he discovered that he could enter into private employment; that he could enter into the employment of one of the very firms who are engaged in supplying armor for the United States. Forthwith he applied to be put upon the retired list. The physical defect which was not sufficient to prevent him from obtaining his promotion upon the active list operated to put him upon the retired list, and he is now receiving a salary of $5,000 a year, I think, from one of these private concerns.

The principle that I advocate, and I do it without the slightest personal unkindness to the naval officers who have been alluded to, but not named, which I believe ought to be sustained and which I believe it will be a mistake not to sustain, which I believe it will be a mistake to have stricken down out of sympathy for these two excellent gentlemen, is the principle that when the Government is doing business with great contractors to whom it is paying millions and millions of dollars, the men that wear the uniform and draw the pay of the United States, if they are connected at all with those transactions shall be on the side of the Government, and shall not be allowed, while they continue to draw the pay and wear the uniform of the United States, to use the knowledge and the skill which they have acquired in the service of the Government to the detriment of the Government.

Mr. President, that is the whole of it. If this amendment is to be voted down because these two men will find it inconvenient a year from the 30th of June, 1897, to get employment somewhere else than in the offices of the contractors with the Government, let that be understood, and let it be understood also as a principle that we will encourage the men who are officers in the Army and the Navy of the United States when they get upon the retired lists to seek employment with firms, with contractors, with builders, who are making themselves rich, or seeking to make themselves rich, on enormous contracts with the Government. Let it be understood that things are to be mixed up in this way, so that when we see an officer of the Navy or call an officer of the Navy, or see an officer of the Army or call an officer of the Army, we shall not know whether he is the servant of the Government, paid to serve the Government and to protect the Government, or whether he is in the employment of a Government contractor, employed to serve that contractor against the interests of the Government.

Mr. HAWLEY. What date does the Senator from New Hampshire state the provision will take effect?

Mr. CHANDLER. On the 30th day of June next year—1897.

Mr. HAWLEY. And the amendment of the Senator from Maryland fixes 1898?

Mr. GORMAN. I suggested that.

Mr. HAWLEY. I thought the Senator offered an amendment?

Mr. GORMAN. I did, but I withdrew it.

Mr. HAWLEY. I do not hear the Senator.

Mr. GORMAN. I suggested to the Senator from New Hampshire to modify his amendment. I understood him to say 1898 would be agreeable to him. I only made the suggestion; I did not offer an amendment.

Mr. CHANDLER. I suggested the amendment without consulting my associates upon the committee, who I find dissent from my modification, and therefore I revert now to the original amendment, which provides that it shall be unlawful for officers of the Navy to accept such employment after the 30th day of June, 1897.

Mr. HAWLEY. Just one word more of comment upon what the Senator has said and I am done. I do not know whether he approves of certain naval officers who have shown their great skill in mechanics and capacity as executive officers resigning from the Navy; I do not know whether he approves of that, which has frequently occurred, of officers becoming entirely familiar with this business, exhibiting great mechanical skill and executive ability, resigning from the Navy and then going into these private establishments. He does not object to that, does he?

Mr. CHANDLER. I have never objected to it, but I do say that there is danger that a system will grow up which will be injurious to the Government.

Mr. HAWLEY. If a system grows up on account of the superior excellency of the young gentlemen we have employed in the Navy, such excellency that the great manufacturing concerns who know what they want, and get it, will come after them, I think that is creditable. The gentlemen who go out and accept such profitable employment are the men that will not be found lagging in case there shall be a great war. We may be sure they will give a good account of themselves and will be found among our future admirals.

Mr. CHANDLER. I should like to answer the Senator a little further. Of course we can not prevent an officer of the Navy resigning if he chooses to resign and go into private employment. If he were to resign after he has served the Government in connection with the business and the work of contractors and intended to go into their employment under circumstances that would be vicious and scandalous, the Secretary of the Navy might, of course, refuse to accept the resignation. That is a thing we can not help if officers of the Army and Navy choose to leave the service at the proper time and under proper conditions, but we can prevent men who continue to remain members of the military organization from entering into the service of Government contractors while they remain connected with the military or naval service.

Mr. HAWLEY. While they are on the active list the President or the Secretary of the Navy has absolute command over their actions, and they can not accept any such employment without specific permission. So that this prohibitory provision of the Senator will apply only to those men who are so unfortunate as to be retired while they still have the full possession of their intellectual and physical faculties.

Mr. CHANDLER. The committee intend to prevent the Secretary of the Navy from allowing officers on the active list taking such employment. Such employment has been allowed and the custom has been an injurious one; and the committee propose to prohibit it by law as to both active and retired officers.

Mr. TILLMAN. The assertion has been made here that these officers were retired contrary to their wishes and that it was a hardship for them to be so retired, was it not?

Mr. HAWLEY. I know it was in one case, for I have the personal assurance of the gentleman himself regarding it. As to the other particular case referred to I do not know, but his case was that of an unquestioned and somewhat serious disability, not affecting his intellect, but his eyesight.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have the Navy Register, and on page 78 is a list of the lieutenants of the Navy on the retired list. Running down the list I find the names of the two officers in question, and opposite their names the act of Congress under which they are retired. I have taken the trouble to get that act, and I will read it to show you how little truth there is in the claims which have been made. Section 23 of the act of August 30, 1861, under which these officers are retired, reads as follows:

Whenever any officer, on being ordered to perform the duties appropriate to his commission, reports himself unable to comply with such order, or when, in the judgment of the President, an officer is incapacitated to perform the duties of his office, the President, at his discretion, may direct the Secretary of the Navy to refer the case of such officer to a board of not more than nine or less than five commissioned officers, two-fifths of whom shall be members of the Medical Corps of the Navy, etc.

The beginning of the act of retirement rests with the officer himself or with the President. It is not an obligatory retirement at all, and therefore we are compelled under these circumstances to at least suppose that these officers, finding that they can get very remunerative employment, desire to get on the retired list and to receive pay from the Government, while at the same time they are holding their rank and getting higher salaries from these private concerns than they are getting as officers of the Navy. There is no hardship in these officers being retired at all under that idea, because you can not conceive of the President having a prejudice in such a matter and coming forward and saying, "Here, you are color-blind; you must get out." How does the President know it? The man has been in the employ of the Government twenty-five years; he has been an exceptionally bright officer; he has won his way; and is it supposable we should ever have a President so mean as to tell that man he must get out of the Navy. Now, suppose an officer comes forward of his own accord and says, "I am color-blind, and would like to get retired pay;" then it is optional with him whether he retires from the Navy or not. There is no great hardship in that.

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the Senator allow me to make an explanation?

Mr. TILLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. HAWLEY. The officer referred to, who is partially disabled by reason of color-blindness, had himself a suspicion of it coming on, but it was officially ascertained by the board who examined him for promotion, and he was obliged to admit that he ought not to have command of a ship at times. So he could not feel like remaining in the Navy as half of a man, and only be allowed to perform certain shore duties or office duties. Therefore, much to his sorrow, he felt compelled to get out of the Navy. But how on earth they contrived to put him on a list which gives him only half of what the ordinary officer gets I can not understand.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President—

Mr. TILLMAN. Excuse me a minute.

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. I happened to be present and was surprised when that gentleman was before the committee, and I took the trouble to inquire as to the causes of his retirement, why in the case of a man seemingly so fitted for command it should be considered necessary to retire him, and he expressed the belief that he was just as competent to command a vessel now and to do just as good service as he ever had done. You see, then, that while he might not have been promoted on account of color-blindness, he could not have been retired on account of it under this act.

We are contending here simply for a principle. I do not think anybody will charge any member of the committee, certainly I do not think anybody will charge me, with any personal bias or prejudice or desire to make a spectacle or example of these officers. I consider them as honorable men who have gone into this business, because it is the habit now to go into such things. We are now, however, trying to purify the service and to get back to a sound basis of morals, and I think the committee amendment ought to go through.

Mr. HAWLEY. One matter more, just as to this retired officer. He told me last evening—I did not know at the time who was the officer who went before the board, but last evening when I saw him I remembered that I had made his acquaintance very pleasantly before. He told me that it was not right for him to take command of a ship; that he could not fairly and honorably do so, because he found from experience toward the latter part of his active duty that it was necessary for him, and he made it his practice, to have a young officer, a veteran seaman, by his side when he was on deck to see the lights ahead, and he could not honorably continue in the service when he could not command a ship.

Mr. CHANDLER. I wish the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] to hear that statement, that the officer himself admitted that it would not be judicious for him to command a ship. The Senator from Delaware had something to say about superserviceable surgeons retiring an officer against his will.

Mr. HAWLEY. I can say something about it, in my opinion. I do not know that the retirement was unjust in other cases, for I have not inquired; but I say something very cruel and unjust was done in the case to which I have referred.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am ready to vote to restore that officer to rank on the active list of the Navy, and will vote for it, but I do think that if he is going to take the pay of the Government on the retired list, he ought not to take pay from the enemy. He should resign if he is going to serve that enemy. It is very easy to get out of the Navy if employment by the steel companies is more remunerative employment than the honor of belonging to the retired list of the Navy; his resignation can go in, and that settles the whole business, and we get rid of the odium attaching to the immorality, or the dishonor, or whatever you may call it, which now certainly is held by some of us to exist.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FAULKNER in the chair). The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER].

Mr. GORMAN. Do I understand the Senator has withdrawn his modification?

Mr. CHANDLER. I have withdrawn the modification I made to the amendment.

Mr. GORMAN. Then I move to amend the amendment by offering the suggestion of the Senator from New Hampshire.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland moves an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the amendment by inserting after the word "employment," in next to the last line, the words "of any officer not now in such employment"; so as to read:

And such employment of any officer not now in such employment is hereby made unlawful after said date.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I happen to be in the very impartial attitude of not knowing either of these gentlemen, not knowing even their names, and I am prepared to vote on this question upon the principle involved in it. It is a very plain and simple principle, one recognized in Holy Writ by the expression "No man can serve two masters," one deeply embedded in the jurisprudence of this country, which prohibits any man from serving two parties who have antagonistic interests. No man, under the law of the land, can be the agent of the buyer and at the same time the agent of the seller; no trustee is allowed to deal on his own account with a trust estate. It is not upon any idea that corruption and bad faith must necessarily flow from this inconsistent relation; it comes from a higher principle, that men who are engaged in doing work shall not occupy positions which might—that is the word—which might influence their conduct.

Now, here is an officer of the United States, recognized as an officer, drawing a salary as an officer, and owing obedience and duty to the United States as an officer. He goes and embarks in employment with a man who has a contract with the United States. So his duty as an officer of the United States leads him one way to protect the interests of the United States, and his duty as an employee of these contractors leads him in another direction.

This idea was very fully expressed by the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL], who argued that it was a real advantage to the United States to have one of its own officers in one of these shops, upon the ground that he was obliged to disclose to the United States any defect in the armor it should make. Mr. President, that is nothing more than saying that he is a spy for the United States in the service of one of the contractors of the United States. We do not want any spies. The question is not whether the United States is to be benefited or whether it is to be injured by this relation. The question is whether it is not an immoral and inconsistent relation, forbidden not only by Holy Writ, but by the law of the land; and for that reason I think the amendment of the committee ought to be adopted, with this single exception, that there ought not to be any delay in the severance of this improper and immoral relation; it ought to commence now.

I confess with somewhat of astonishment and somewhat of amazement to having heard for the first time during this debate that any officers of the United States felt themselves at liberty to accept employment from a contractor with the United States and in relation to the matter about which the contract was made.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, the question of immorality depends entirely upon the question whether there is any injury to the United States. I suppose it will hardly be denied that if the acceptance of this engagement on the part of this retired officer was a benefit to the United States, and has been done openly, there would be no immorality in it, whatever may be the law. I will not dispute with my friend from Mississippi in regard to the law, if there is any law by which a person in the employment of another person, with the consent of that person and of both of the parties, shall openly agree that his service shall be used for what? To see that one of the parties complies strictly with his agreement, and after he shall have devoted his skill to the performance of the contract in favor of the Government that another and a distinct person, not in the employment of this company, shall be the final judge and inspector.

If there be any disadvantage, any injury to the United States, or to any person in that position, it can not be discovered; it can not be pointed out. It has been said that a man so situated serves two masters. That is not true. In a certain form of words it is true, but pertinent to the subject, pertinent to the considerations which determine whether a man can serve two masters or not, it has no relation here, because the man is not a spy. A man is not a spy under such circumstances. When I say to another man, "I will agree to take your servant, who is in your confidence, who is bound to you, and use his skill, his loyalty, and his fidelity to you to see that this obligation of mine is performed, and then you may, after that is done, subvert it to another inspection," it is but a form of words, with which the Scripture, of which my distinguished friend speaks, has nothing to do. There is no likeness between God and mammon in this case. In this case the company obligate themselves not to the United States, but to take this skilled servant of the United States and say, "You are subject to court-martial; you will be disgraced in the estimation of the fellows of your own corps; you will sacrifice your reputation and the honor of the profession to which you have been devoted, although now isolated from it, if you fail to have this work done in the manner stipulated, or if you conceal any defects." How is that going to be unfair, serving two masters, or attempting to conceal something? How is it that it is not an additional security to the Government of the United States that the contract shall be faithfully performed? It is impossible that it can be so.

Then, again, as I said before, there is the larger consideration which is involved in this amendment that the officers of the United States shall be isolated and separated from all the arts, all the progress, all the inventions, and the practical applications of science which are being made, and left with a small pittance to dawdle their lives away in idleness.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I can understand very readily the differences of opinion as to the amendment offered by the committee, but I do not see how it is possible to sustain the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] on any ground.

This is a question of principle. Either this double service now entered into by these officers is right or it is wrong. If it is right, none of them should be prevented from undertaking it; if it is wrong, none of them should be allowed to undertake it. As I understand the amendment of the Senator from Maryland, it is to prevent all officers in the future from accepting such employment, but allows those who are now in the employ of the contractors to remain there. That seems to me simply injustice. The provision ought to be made general, or it ought not to pass at all.

I would ask, Mr. President, if the question now pending is on the amendment to the amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the pending question.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts, I think, fails to remember this case. If it had not been for the fact that both the great Departments, the Navy and the War Departments, in the development of this industry had encouraged their officers to go out and take employment in these works and aid in their development—such a development as the world has never known in the same period of time—I could understand that this provision ought not to apply, and that these gentlemen ought not to be exempted; but they were encouraged to go; they were permitted under the rules of the Departments to enter into this service; and the Departments did another thing that in the light of to-day would not be tolerated, and that was to give leaves of absence to important officers of the Government to enter into private enterprises and to receive compensation during the time of their leaves of absence.

At that time both the Secretaries of the Navy—Mr. Whitney and Mr. Tracy, two of the greatest Secretaries we have ever had—were only looking to the great result to be accomplished if the Government induced their officers to engage in such service. No man in Congress or out of Congress thought it was dishonorable on the part of these naval officers to accept such employment when their Government believed that they could render greater service by doing it. It was right, and it was encouraged; but we would not permit it to-day, and I would not permit it in the future, because the exigencies do not require it. There is much skill outside now to go on with the work. These great factories are accomplished results. They stand to-day as wonderful monuments to the genius of the American people. They are prepared to make all the armor and all the steel required by the Government, and, I am glad to say, it is better, or supposed to be better by all the experts, than any other which is now made in the world. Now, Congress should not reverse the action of the Department and overturn a system which we have all agreed to without exception, and deliberately deprive two or three young men, whom I do not know, and I have probably never seen but one of them, of their pensions, for that is practically what the pay of a retired officer is, and say to them, "The work you have done is wrong; what you have been encouraged to do by your Government is dishonorable, and this employment must cease from this time henceforth."

I submit to the Senator from Massachusetts that no man in private life could be guilty of such action and be sustained by the good judgment of the people who surround him. It is not a business transaction; it is not a fair transaction.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, no one has suggested—certainly I never suggested, and I have never heard anyone suggest—that it was dishonorable in these officers to take this employment, or that it was otherwise than an honorable employment. They took it, undoubtedly, with the approval of the Department, and as they had a right to do. Nobody desires to cast the slightest reflection upon them. But the system has proved to be a bad system, in my opinion; and I think it is obvious that it must be a bad system from the double service it involves.

My sole point is that if we are to make a general rule, as I think we should, that naval officers, whether on the active or retired list, are not in future to take employment with Government contractors, we should make it apply to all naval officers. The naval officers who are now in the employ of those contractors should be obliged either to give up their retired pay or their service with the contractors. They have had both for a number of years. They were undoubtedly led to do so by the approval of the Department, but if Congress decides that the policy and system are bad, I can not see that it is any hardship to them any more than to any other officers who may desire to enter into the same employment to be deprived of the opportunity of drawing two salaries. Besides, a year's grace is given under the amendment, as I understand, to enable them to make other arrangements. It is not proposed to force them out on twenty-four hours' notice. They are given a chance to remain where they are and resign from the Navy, or to seek employment elsewhere. The amendment really only cuts off those persons who are contracting with the Government from the sphere of this employment.

I have no feeling in regard to these officers. I do not have the pleasure of knowing any of them personally. I have been written to in regard to them. That is the only thing which I have heard about them. I have been urged to vote against this amendment because it affects one of those officers in this way. Beyond that I have no interest; but it seems to me the present system is a bad one, and I can not see how it can be regarded as otherwise than a bad and dangerous system, which may constantly give rise to suspicion and to insinuations. I do not see how it can possibly be right to put a naval officer in the position of serving a contractor who is engaged in dealing with the Government.

I hope, however, the Senator from Maryland will not suppose that I intended to reflect on anybody—not for a moment. I know they are as honorable men as there are.

Mr. GORMAN. I did not understand the Senator to reflect upon anybody, but I wanted to call his attention to what I believed to be the injustice of the proposition he presents. The Senator from Massachusetts and nearly all the Senators who take the view of the Committee on Naval Affairs present the case as if these men were serving two masters at the same time—serving the Government and serving the contractors. That can not be done. Nothing of that kind is involved in this proposition. A retired naval officer is never seen at the Navy Department, and has no interest in what is going on there. His services can be commanded in time of war hereafter, it is true, but so far as the transactions of the Navy Department are concerned after he is retired he is as free from connection with them as Mr. Carnegie or the president of the Bethlehem company. He has absolutely no interest in the Navy Department except to draw his pay at the end of the quarter. He is not connected with the business; he is not expected to serve the Government; his services are not required and not asked for; he goes out and receives employment elsewhere and the Government recognizes him as they would any other foreman or any other superintendent at one of these factories. The place he was educated or the fact that he draws a pension amounts to nothing.

Mr. HALE. Does not the Senator know that retired officers are at the call of the Government at any time?

Mr. GEORGE. We can not hear the Senator from Maine on this side.

Mr. HALE. I ask if the Senator from Maryland does not know that retired officers are at the call and beck of the Government?

Mr. GORMAN. Yes.

Mr. HALE. And that a retired officer may at any time be requested by the Navy Department to go on a board to investigate just such circumstances as we have now before us?

Mr. GORMAN. Yes.

Mr. HALE. And that it is not an infrequent thing that when important supervisory boards deal with charges of this kind and deal with cases of this kind competent retired officers are put on those boards? They are not separated from the Navy Department; they are separated from certain active duty on shipboard and in shipyards; but they may be requested to deal with just such subjects as we are now dealing with. That is an additional reason why they ought not to be in the employment of these companies.

Mr. GORMAN. In very rare cases I admit that is the case, but the rule is as I have stated. When they are retired, that is practically the end of them so far as the business of the office is concerned. They have no facilities to ascertain what is going on in the Navy Department any more than I have or you have.

But, Mr. President, when this examination began it was not upon this line at all. An abuse, I admit, had grown up in the Department, an abuse that ought to have been corrected and will be corrected, and that was granting leaves of absence to prominent officers in the Department who are in the regular service to go off and take employment from private establishments; and the resolution and the statements in the press all struck at a very high officer of the Government who was supposed to have had not only that sort of employment, but an interest in the process by which the steel was made. As a matter of course that ought to be corrected, and that, I understand, is to be corrected. It would not be tolerated at the Department any longer. But nobody supposed that there was any abuse in the retired officers going into private employment.

Mr. President, I do not desire to continue this discussion. Already too much time has been devoted to it. I merely wish to say that I believe great injustice is about to be done these two or three gentlemen, whom I do not know and in whom I have no interest whatever. If it were not for the fact that they had been encouraged to accept this employment and entered into it with the full belief, as we all believe, that it was to the interest of the Government to do it, then I could understand how they may be stricken down within one year and deprived of this employment. But having been encouraged to do it, and it being the desire of the Government that these officers should be so employed, I think it is unwise and unjust to these men now by an act to embrace them in the category of officers who have done wrong.

Mr. SQUIRE. I should like to ask the Senator from Maryland, before he takes his seat, if it is not true that one of the Secretaries of the Navy suggested or requested such an employment?

Mr. GORMAN. As I said a moment ago, my understanding is that the sole object of the two great Secretaries of the Navy, Mr. Whitney and Mr. Tracy, was to build up these great establishments and to make this armor plate perfect, and they encouraged all these officers to do it, and in the light they had at that time they not only encouraged the men upon the retired list, but absolutely gave leaves of absence to retired officers of the Government that they might go out and during the time of the leave accept this employment. It was the policy of the Government, and the officers are not at all at fault in it.

Mr. SQUIRE. I was informed yesterday by a gentleman in whom I have great confidence, and who is in a position to know, that Secretary Tracy did encourage the going of retired officers into the establishment for the purpose of engaging in this business, believing it to be for the benefit of the Government that they should engage in the business for that company. It seems to me it is a matter of great injustice, under these circumstances, for us to criticize those men. It seems to me there is an unfriendly spirit here; and I am sorry to see it manifested. For my part, whether the amendment should prevail or not, I intend to vote against it. I think it is a piece of injustice and casts a reflection upon these worthy officers now retired from the Navy.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senate again to the real situation. It is plainly an instance where a committee of the Senate, charged with grave responsibility on public matters, is seeking to prevent what it believes to be a grievance, and, as is not infrequently the case, the attempt at a kind of reformation runs across the private wishes and the private interests of individuals.

Now, it does not follow that those individuals are corrupt, that they are worthy of censure. They are not said here to be corrupt or worthy of censure. But it does follow that any attempt which is made seriously to better things and better conditions ought not to be allowed in the Senate to be thwarted because of the impotency of a few individuals whom that attempt runs across. I have no doubt that the Senate has been very considerably and pertinaciously lobbied in this respect by friends of the gentlemen and by themselves, it may be, because the amendment will interfere with them. Mr. President, if that is going to be the rule of the Senate, if it is impossible to pass an act that is for the benefit of the general public and the Government in the future because it runs across the interests of a few individuals and those individuals can turn the current of our action awry, we may as well attempt to act without committees here or to do anything that is in the nature of reforming governmental abuses and set up a good standard.

I wish to say a word as to why it is that this condition has come about. I agree with what the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] has said, that in the beginning it was a very desirable thing that men should be enlisted in the work of building up great armor-plate establishments and establishments to manufacture ordnance for the two military branches of the Government, the Army and the Navy. We had none. We were at the mercy of the foreign manufacturer, and Congress embarked in it honestly and seriously and earnestly by liberal appropriations, understanding that we were to give what, in fact, was a great bonus to establishments that would come in and devote American wit and American ingenuity, and put us on a plane with other powers of the world in having private manufactories. I advocated that as much as any member on the floor of the Senate. I have always believed in it. Out of it came first the Bethlehem Iron Works, works that have expanded and enlarged and have become a pride to us and in which all American people have great pride. Later, when it was found that we were continuing to appropriate liberally for the Navy for armor plate and guns, and also ordnance for the Army, another establishment was called into being, and the great reason which was urged why we should encourage another establishment, and why the Secretary of the Navy determined to divide the contracts and give them not all to Bethlehem, but one to the Carnegie works, was that we needed competitors. So the Government embarked in that, in the meantime giving liberal appropriations. They went on and increased their plants and made them what to-day is a wonder in the eyes of the world. Very soon the system, or the expectation of a system, of competitive bids disappeared between the two, and now there is nothing of that kind.

But while these concerns have been developing a great plant Congress has been doing an immense thing for them. We have appropriated and paid to them about $11,000,000, and contracts, now perhaps just being closed, for two other ships at $3,000,000 more will make $15,000,000 paid to these concerns. It has now come about that the Committee on Naval Affairs believes from its investigation, not that these men are not meritorious in building up their plants, but that they have been largely paid for all that, and that the time has come when they can afford to furnish armor for the Government and make a reasonable and great profit at rates very much less than they have been getting heretofore. The Committee on Naval Affairs believes that for all their enterprise they have been amply compensated by the great appropriations of millions upon millions of dollars, and that the time has come when they ought to consider present conditions and reduce their bids. Therefore we are confronted with a condition of antagonism that has never existed until to-day.

Now, that being the condition and these two forces being antagonistic, being what the Senator from South Carolina calls enemies, being inimical, it is believed by the committee that in the new condition which now arises, where it is a contest between the Government and these concerns, they ought to reduce their bids and still have a fair and ample profit. We find connected with them and employed by them officers in the Navy of the United States. I do not care whether they are active or whether they are retired, the principle is the same. The moment that conflict looms upon the sky and the moment it is a battle drawn between the Government and these concerns as to reducing the price of armor and getting fair contracts there ought to be in the concerns no man who is an officer of the Government.

Mr. President, it does not stop here. If two officers can be employed by those two concerns, ten can be employed. If a retired officer who was retired because of certain physical causes for which he was not to blame can be employed, and the Senate declares that he may be employed, every man to-day in the Navy Department who is engaged in representing the Government, in furnishing it with facts and considerations which it can urge in favor of reduced appropriations and reduced prices, may all the time be haunted by the temptation that in one way or another to-morrow he may resign or be retired and go into the employment of the concerns, and give the wit and the knowledge and the influence that he still holds in the Navy Department to those establishments.

This is more wide reaching than the question relating to two men which has been urged here. It is very far, deep reaching, Mr. President. I can not see, and I do not believe that anybody can see, that unless there had been the happening of two or three officers molested to some extent there would have been a single objection to the provision reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. President, it will be a bad day for the Navy of the United States and for the status of the officers of the Navy of the United States when the Senate puts its seal of disapprobation on an amendment like this, which prevents the employment of naval officers in concerns that are competing with the Government and are trying to get extravagant rates of appropriation and when the Government is trying to reduce them. That very thing will react upon officers of the Navy. It is no kindness to the general personnel of the Navy, the officers broad and large, to contend against an amendment of this kind. You may depend upon it, sir, that the officers of the Navy who are engaged really in protecting the interests of the Government have no sympathy with a contest that is made against an amendment so wide reaching and so conclusive as this amendment, and which has nothing whatever to be said about it except that it does interfere for the moment with two or three officers.

I will not go over the proposition as to the indulgence of the Senate in being willing to postpone the operation of the provision until these men can get other employment, but it is absurd to say, if these men are so skillful and so needed at these works, that they can not get employment in the other great fields of American mechanical industry all over the country. If these two gentlemen are as competent and as honorable (and I believe them to be) as is stated here, they will not remain out of employment one day after June 30, 1897. They will go into other employments before that time, employments that are not connected and tangled up with concerns that have contracts with the Government.

Mr. SQUIRE. Mr. President, I do not desire to prolong the discussion. I have enjoyed listening to the interesting statement of the Senator from Maine, and I listened with great pleasure to what was said yesterday by other Senators on the floor. It seems to me we are making a great deal of fuss over a small matter, and that a few pertinent, plain points might be brought out which would decide the question in the mind of a reasonable man without any long discussion.

In the first place, what was this agitation about? In the beginning the committee were trying to ascertain what some armor plates cost. They had the experts of the Government at their command; they had the officers of the Navy; they had the whole Navy Department with its personnel at their command. I suppose these officers appeared before the committee, from statements made to the Senate yesterday. Then it appears that these two gentlemen, who were retired officers of the Navy, but who now hold a business relation to the companies in which they are serving, by permission of the Government, were called before the committee to give information, and that they were required on the part of the committee to expose business secrets they had ascertained while being employed by those companies. Now, it does not seem right—

Mr. BACON. If the Senator from Washington will permit me, the Senator misstates the fact, unintentionally. They were not so required. On the contrary—

Mr. SQUIRE. They were invited to appear before the committee.

Mr. BACON. On the contrary, as soon as it became apparent to the committee that they were in an embarrassing position the committee ceased to press the question upon them. They were not so required in any sense.

Mr. HALE. The committee did not even invite them.

Mr. BACON. No, sir.

Mr. HALE. They came of their own volition. The committee never invited them. The committee invited the men who are there as supervisors of the Government, and to the surprise of the committee these gentlemen appeared representing the companies. The committee never halted them before it, and never expected that they would be there, because it recognized the delicacy of their situation.

Mr. SQUIRE. I understand the committee did expect an answer from them, or it would not have asked the question. Of course the committee asked the question, or it could not have known the fact. As I understand the matter, the whole point turns on whether these men should be compelled, from the fact that they were retired officers of the Navy, to testify or make a statement before a committee. I do not say that they were bulldozed or anything of that kind.

Mr. GRAY. Will the Senator from Washington allow me to call the attention of the Senator from Maine to the statement that I do not think he quite concluded. He said they came there as representing the Government. I suppose he did not mean that.

Mr. HALE. I said they did not come as representing the Government.

Mr. GRAY. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. HALE. The committee sought the testimony of naval officers who had been detailed by the Government to inspect and supervise the works, and to the surprise of the committee when it met to receive the testimony of those officers these two gentlemen appeared, who did not represent the Government, but represented the Bethlehem and the Carnegie works. So it was a surprise to the committee. I was surprised and the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER], who was the author of the resolution, was surprised at their appearance. But the gentlemen being here, the committee proceeded to ask them certain general questions. The committee did not press them, as the Senator from Washington has indicated, because, as was brought out in the debate yesterday, the committee realized the delicacy of their situation. These men were serving two masters, and as the Senator from Delaware suggested yesterday we had no right to expect these men in the employment of these private concerns to tell us what the armor cost. The committee did not press it.

Mr. SQUIRE. I ask the Senator from Maine if it is possible and can be true that the Senator from New Hampshire, the author of the resolution, did not know exactly who these men were and all about them.

Mr. HALE. I say he did not.

Mr. SQUIRE. I have been led to believe that he has known them for years and knows all about them.

Mr. HALE. That may be.

Mr. CHANDLER. I did not know they were in the employment of those companies until they came and told us.

Mr. SQUIRE. I supposed the Senator from New Hampshire knew, having met these gentlemen recently, and I was in the same party when visiting Bethlehem.

Mr. HALE. It was long before that time.

Mr. BACON. It was before that time.

Mr. SQUIRE. I know, it was just before that time.

Mr. CHANDLER. I never had the honor of visiting the Bethlehem works until very recently, in company with the Senator from Washington.

Mr. SQUIRE. I understood the Senator from New Hampshire was very familiar with the personnel of that establishment.

Mr. CHANDLER. If I had stopped to think I could have straightened the subject out. But it is a little confusing to all of us when we meet these naval officers and really do not know exactly whether they are employed for us or employed against us.

Mr. SQUIRE. It seems to me we are laying too much stress on this matter. I should like to have the Government receive bids at a reduced price for armor plate, and I believe the committee have every means at their disposal for ascertaining the truth about the cost, so far as the Government can ascertain the present status of the making of armor plates. I believe that information is all easily derivable from the Government experts. It was not necessary to examine these men. If they appeared before the committee, I suppose they appeared by somebody's invitation and for the purpose of giving such information as they could properly give with due regard to the interest that they were engaged to serve.

I am not in favor of punishing these men because they declined to expose the business secrets of the establishments they were serving. That is what it amounts to. It is simply persecution, no matter whether they were pressed or not. As I remarked before, I do not say that they were unduly pressed.

Mr. BACON. The Senator from Washington is entirely mistaken as to the whole point in the case. He is mistaken as to what was the motive in the committee in suggesting the amendment and as to the true question before the Senate. There was no demand upon these officers that they should disclose any secrets, nor was there any declination on their part.

Mr. SQUIRE. That was the burden of the debate yesterday.

Mr. BACON. Not at all. The whole point is simply as to the situation which was then presented of officers of the Navy being put in a position where they were occupying an antagonistic position—

Mr. SQUIRE. Where they could not give this information.

Mr. BACON. The interest of the Government suggested to us the impropriety of their occupying such a position; but, I repeat, there never was a demand upon them to disclose secrets, nor was there any declination on their part to disclose them.

Mr. SQUIRE. Then I do not see why we should press the question, because that was the point made yesterday in debate. One Senator, perhaps the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN], made the remark. My recollection is that it was he.

Mr. ALLEN. I think I will stand sponsor for what nobody else will be responsible for.

Mr. CALL. Will the Senator from Washington allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. SQUIRE. Certainly.

Mr. CALL. I wish to state, in reply to the suggestion made by the Senator from Washington, that there is no evidence here nor is it true that these men are officers of the Navy. It is not true. It is a mere statement of words. They are disconnected from the Navy in every shape and form. They are pensioners, retired officers, and have no more connection with the Navy than I and the Senator from Washington have.

Mr. TILLMAN. Except—

Mr. CALL. One moment. Except that they are subject to a court-martial; that is all. They have no duties to perform. They have simply a liability—that is, if they violate the Rules and Articles of War, if they conduct themselves in any manner with duplicity, dishonesty, or dishonorably, they are subject still to a court-martial. That I understand to be the situation.

Mr. TILLMAN. Are they not liable to be called into the service of the Government in case of war?

Mr. CALL. As you and I.

Mr. TILLMAN. Oh, no; they go back as officers, with the same rank. They do not go as you and I, as men who would be picked up.

Mr. CALL. That does not make any difference at all. That is wholly foreign to the subject. It does not make any difference whether a man serves as an officer or a private. They are subject to be called into the service, and if they come back as officers what has that to do with it? No more than if they came back as privates. We are all liable to be called into the service of the Government. That has nothing to do with this question.

But I wish to say that there is one very plain point in this matter. If the committee did not inquire of these officers whether they had been guilty of or subject to suspicion of collusion in concealing anything from the Government, I think the committee ought to have inquired. If the officers have been guilty of any dishonesty, of any dishonorable conduct, either directly or indirectly, they ought to be dismissed from the service. But why should others be punished who have not been guilty? I understand there is no suspicion of that kind. I understand that these men are of unspotted character, and I make no suggestion to the contrary; but I say if they had been, the remedy is to court-martial them, prove the fact, and discharge them from the service. But what harm is it to the public service that other men have maintained the esprit de corps of the Navy, have performed their duties, have contributed their skill and received compensation for it elsewhere than the Government, and why should these men who have been innocent be punished? Let us know whether the practice has resulted disadvantageously to the Government or not. That is the question in this case.

Mr. SQUIRE. I did not intend to occupy the floor for any length of time, but the Senator from Florida has very kindly interjected remarks that are on the line of thought that I was about to express. I believe that these officers, after having served the Government honorably so many years, ought not to be required to resign in order to engage in employment. I believe that they understand more about this branch of business than about any other kind of business. They are peculiarly fitted for certain duties in connection with these great works. As I understand the matter, the works are not employed simply in making armor plate or in making guns. They are large manufacturing plants making steel for all purposes, great mills making Bessemer steel and merchant steel, and doing an enormous business not only in this country, but all over the world. It seems to me puerile in us to demand that these retired officers of the Navy, after having served the Government for twenty-five, thirty, thirty-five, or forty years, simply holding positions as retired naval officers so as to maintain the rank and dignity they have earned by years of honorable service, should be compelled to resign the positions in which they receive a beggarly pittance of perhaps $900 a year for the purpose of accepting employment under these great companies in an honorable way, when they have been in a position in which they may be able to render service to the Government, as was believed by several Secretaries of the Navy, who suggested or encouraged their employment, thinking such service to be for the advantage of the Government.

Mr. President, it seems to me that we have discussed this question amply. We all understand it. I am ready to vote upon it, and I am going to vote against it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] to the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER].

Mr. PASCO. I should like to have the amendment stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Maryland to the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "employment," in line 7, insert the words "of any officer not now in such employment"; so that it will read:

And provided further, That no payment shall be made from the appropriations in this bill to any officer in the Navy or Marine Corps on the active or retired list while such officer is employed, after June 30, 1897, by any person or company furnishing naval supplies or war material to the Government; and such employment of any officer not now in such employment is hereby made unlawful after said date.

Mr. HALE. In other words, as the Senator from Ohio suggests, it gives a monopoly to the men who are now in the employment, and nobody else.

Mr. CALL. I think we ought to have a quorum present. I ask for a call of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Allen,	Frye,	McBride,	Sewell,
Allison,	Gallinger,	McMillan,	Sherman,
Bacon,	Gear,	Martin,	Shoup,
Bate,	George,	Mills,	Squire,
Berry,	Gordon,	Mitchell, Oreg.	Stewart,
Brown,	Gorman,	Mitchell, Wis.	Teller,
Burrows,	Gray,	Nelson,	Tillman,
Butler,	Hale,	Pasco,	Vilas,
Call,	Harris,	Peffer,	Waithall,
Chandler,	Hawley,	Pettigrew,	White,
Chilton,	Hill,	Pritchard,	Wilson,
Clark,	Jones, Nev.	Pugh,	Wolcott,
Cockrell,	Kyle,	Quay,
Faulkner,	Lodge,	Roach,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-four Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] to the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER].

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. QUAY. Let us have the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. PETTIGREW and Mr. LODGE. Let the amendment be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated. The SECRETARY. After line 23, on page 2, it is proposed to insert:

And provided further, That no payment shall be made from the appropriations in this bill to any officer in the Navy or Marine Corps on the active or retired list while such officer is employed, after June 30, 1897, by any person or company furnishing naval supplies or war material to the Government; and such employment is hereby made unlawful after said date.

Mr. GORMAN. With a view of making it a permanent law instead of applying only to the provisions of the pending bill, I move to amend the amendment as I have indicated on the copy which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the amendment so as to read:

And provided further, That hereafter no payment shall be made from appropriations made by Congress to any officer in the Navy or Marine Corps on the active or retired list while such officer is employed, after June 30, 1897, by any person or company furnishing naval supplies or war material to the Government, and such employment is hereby made unlawful after said date.

Mr. GORMAN. The amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire would merely apply the rule to appropriations made in this bill, and the amendment as I propose to amend it will make it apply for all time until repealed by Congress.

Mr. CHANDLER. There is no objection to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire as amended, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GORMAN (when his name was called). I am paired on this particular vote with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN].

Mr. PUGH (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR].

Mr. QUAY (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN]. If he were present I should vote "nay."

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. THURSTON] on political subjects, but I do not think this is such a question, and I therefore vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. WALTHALL (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON]. I transfer my pair to the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LINDSAY], and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. WOLCOTT (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BRICE]. Not being aware how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CARTER. I am paired with the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. GIBSON]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. BACON (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. WETMORE]. Under our arrangement either of us has the right to vote at his discretion with respect to questions not strictly political. Therefore I will allow my vote to stand, although the junior Senator from Rhode Island is not present.

Mr. McMILLAN. I inquire if the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The senior Senator from Kentucky has not voted.

Mr. McMILLAN. I am paired with the senior Senator from Kentucky.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] announced a pair with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] on this particular subject.

Mr. McMILLAN. Then I can vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. CALL (after having voted in the negative). I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR], but I will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. SQUIRE (after having voted in the negative). I am paired with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL], but I think the vote is so overwhelmingly on the other side that I will allow my vote to stand. Under the arrangement I have with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] I can vote without infringing upon our agreement.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I am paired with the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. PALMER].

The result was announced—yeas 45, nays 11; as follows:

YEAS—45.

Allen,	Faulkner,	Mantle,	Pritchard,

So the amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I ask now that the reserved clauses in the bill, beginning at line 16, on page 50, be taken up. Let the amendments be stated as they are reached.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Maine whether it would not be more convenient and better to consider amendments to the first clause of the provision, as to increase of the Navy, which really brings up the main question—I refer to the number of battle ships—before considering the amendments relating to torpedo boats, etc.

Mr. HALE. I think there is force in that suggestion. If the Senator has an amendment to move, I will let the other amendments stand until after it has been passed upon.

Mr. GORMAN. Then, in line 19, page 50, before the words "seagoing coast-line battle ships," I move to strike out "four" and insert "two."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 19, page 50, it is proposed to amend by striking out the word "four" and inserting "two"; so as to read:

INCREASE OF THE NAVY.

That for the purpose of further increasing the naval establishment of the United States the President is hereby authorized to have constructed by contract two seagoing coast-line battle ships designed to carry the heaviest armor and most powerful ordnance upon a displacement of about 11,000 tons, to have the highest practicable speed for vessels of their class, and to cost, exclusive of armament, not exceeding $3,750,000 each.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President—

Mr. QUAY. With the permission of the Senator from Maryland, I move to amend the amendment by striking out the word "two" and inserting "six."

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the amendment by striking out the word "two" and inserting "six"; so as to read:

Six sea-going coast-line battle ships.

Mr. GORMAN. I do not suppose that the Senator from Pennsylvania wants to offer the amendment now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] to the amendment of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN].

Mr. HALE. I hope the Senate will preserve order, because this is an important matter, and I for one desire to hear the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, the pending bill as it comes to the Senate from the House of Representatives appropriates over $31,000,000 to be expended during the next fiscal year. It authorizes contracts for battle ships, armor, and armament amounting to $20,000,000, for which we will be compelled to make appropriations during the next two or three years. It is desirable, and I concur in that view, to build up our Navy, to make it formidable enough to meet all the wants of the country, and I have advocated such a policy from the day I was assigned to the Appropriations Committee until now. We have in the past six or eight years appropriated an immense amount of money on this account. We have kept pace with the requirements of the country until we have succeeded in making a Navy of which the whole country is proud. We have appropriated very liberally when we had the money. It will probably astonish many Senators to know how rapidly we have proceeded in this direction.

Sir, since 1887 to 1896, inclusive, we have appropriated $239,961,109.75, being $95,000,000 more money than was appropriated from 1877 to 1886 on account of the Navy and its construction. We have to-day under construction quite a number of vessels said to be equal in design to any that float in any navy in the world. We have appropriated all the money that was necessary to construct those vessels up to this time. We have taxed the ingenuity of the men who manufacture armor and the tubes for the guns to the full capacity of their great establishments. Indeed, the delay in the construction of the vessels has grown out of the fact that the great steel works have not been able to furnish armor in time to meet the requirements of the shipbuilders. We have now under construction a list of vessels which for their class are as formidable as any that are being constructed in the world.

They are as follows:

It is said that there is necessity for great haste in the construction of more vessels, that we are the fourth or fifth nation in the world in point of tonnage as to navy. It is true that the special message of the President in relation to the Venezuelan matter and the action of Congress in regard to the revolution in Cuba did greatly excite the country. There was a universal determination in and out of Congress to make every preparation to put the nation upon a war footing and to be fully prepared to take more active measures in the affairs of our neighbors on this continent. Happily, these conditions are greatly modified; war is no longer imminent. Therefore there is no necessity for undue haste.

Mr. President, when Congress assembled in December last we were communicated with by the Executive, and we were informed that the financial affairs of the country were such that they required the first consideration; that the condition of the Treasury was such that economy must be exercised in the expenditure of the people's money, or else one of two things must be done: Taxation must be increased by increasing the revenue laws or else more bonds be sold under authority of the act of 1875, the proceeds of which would be applied to the ordinary expenditures of the Government when necessary. In that condition, the Secretary of the Navy, in his annual report communicated to Congress, suggested that two battle ships were all that were necessary, in his opinion, or proper at that time to be constructed, with their armament, costing between seven and eight million dollars each. Vessels of this class cost, exclusive of armament, $3,700,000 each, and the armament costs about as much as the construction of the vessel, an immense amount of money. The Secretary of the Navy at that time said that his present programme was that two of such vessels would be sufficient. We ordered two at the last session of Congress. They are contracted for and under way at Newport News, in the great yard established there. We have at the Cramps and on the Pacific and in the other yards quite a number of vessels still under construction, which will not be completed for a year or two.

But when this great war scare took possession of Congress and the country, then more vessels were asked, larger appropriations were demanded, greater than ever before in the history of the country except in times of actual war; and the Secretary of the Navy, coming before the Appropriations Committees of Congress, reversed his recommendation in his annual report and suggested to Congress that he would be glad to have four or six of these vessels. Indeed, the tendency was, as conveyed by the suggestion of the Senator from Pennsylvania, to order six instead of four great battleships. When the Secretary was asked, "Is the condition of the Treasury such as to warrant an outlay of this character?" his answer was, "Yes." I will give it to you in his own words. When he appeared before the Naval Committee of the House of Representatives, the chairman, Hon. C. A. BOUTELLE, asked him the following question:

Mr. Secretary, you will remember that after the issue of your report in December, 1896, in which you recommended the authorization of a number of new ships, the President, in his annual message, counseled Congress to consider the depleted condition of the Treasury before increasing naval expenditures. Will you kindly state your view as to how far the condition of the revenues has improved in regard to justifying a considerable authorization of new naval vessels at this session of Congress.

Secretary Herbert replied:

There seems to be no reason to be drawn from the condition and prospects of the Treasury against a liberal appropriation for new vessels. The Secretary of the Treasury estimated in his last annual report that there would be a deficit of about $17,000,000 at the end of the present fiscal year—June 30, 1896. He now thinks that the deficit will be less than he then estimated. He also estimated on the basis of existing laws the revenues of the Government for the fiscal year 1897. His conclusion was that there would be a surplus for next year of something over $6,900,000—in round numbers, $7,000,000. Outside of these revenues, to come in in the ordinary way, and which the Treasury Department has estimated as more than sufficient to meet expenditures, there will be in the Treasury on the 1st of July next, excluding the $100,000,000 which the Government attempts always to hold for redemption purposes, $170,000,000 over and above the amount required for matured obligations, so that, in my opinion, the condition of the Treasury justifies as liberal appropriations for new ships as I have asked for to-day.

With that statement before them, the committee with which this bill originated seriously considered the proposition of appropriating for six battle ships, and the six would have been appropriated for but for the fact that the naval constructor and the naval officers, who have intimate knowledge of the conditions and the facilities of the different factories, stated that to appropriate for six ships would not facilitate the construction of the vessels, because the armor could not be furnished for more than four. The fact is that it never has been, up to this date, furnished as rapidly as necessary for all the ships under construction. So the committee in the House of Representatives modified the suggestion for six and sent to us this bill providing for four ships. The statement I have read, coming from a high Cabinet officer, one at the head of this Department, has been considered by many as a justification of those who are advocating the construction of four battle ships and the appropriation of the great amount which is contained in this bill, $51,000,000, in time of peace, in the face of the fact that is known to every Senator and to every Member of the House of Representatives, that there is no revenue enough derived from the tariff, the internal-revenue law, and miscellaneous sources to pay the ordinary expenses of the Government, and that there has been, that there is, and that there will be during this and the next year a deficit in the Treasury.

The distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] and all who have spoken on that side of the Chamber have called attention sharply to the fact that our present revenue laws are not sufficient to meet the wants of the Government. It is true; every word of it is true. There has not been for four years a sufficient amount received into the Treasury from the revenue laws to meet the appropriations of Congress. One hundred and sixty million dollars more than the revenues have already been paid out for pensions, for the construction of ships, and for all the expenses of the Government. This money was the proceeds from the sale of bonds. The question presents itself to this Senate whether, in a time of peace, with no great emergency, it is wise to make these appropriations on the scale which they come to us when you know that the very votes you give for these appropriations mean the further sale of 4 or 4½ per cent Government bonds.

Sir, I take it there is no possibility of increasing the revenues of this Government by any legislation which is proposed by the other side. This Congress has met, will continue in session, and adjourn without having passed a single act to relieve the Treasury from any of the embarrassments under which it labors.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. GORMAN. With pleasure.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am glad the Senator from Maryland now confesses the great sin of the Democratic party. The Republican party did supply rather a defective measure, I concede, but a measure that would have produced at least $50,000,000, and would have been amply sufficient to have carried on the operations of the Government. That bill was sent to the Senate and defeated at its very outset by the votes on the other side of the Chamber exclusively. So the only offer which has been made by the Republican party to furnish means to carry on the Government under a Democratic Administration was defeated early in the session by that party. Therefore it is not fair for the honorable Senator from Maryland to impute this fault, at least, to the Republican party.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, I know how sensitive my distinguished friend from Ohio is upon this subject. I know that he is constantly—and has been during this entire session—constantly arraigning the Democratic party for its shortcomings in tariff legislation. In answer to a suggestion of the President of the United States, who thought that the only legislation which was absolutely necessary to protect the Treasury and prevent this drain upon its gold was that in relation to greenbacks, the Senator from Ohio took issue with the President. His party has taken issue with the President, and the only remedy which he offered was what? First, to authorize the sale of bonds at a lower rate of interest and running a shorter time than those authorized by the act of 1875; and second, a provision to increase the tariff rates on certain articles, a bill which could pass elsewhere under the rules which have been made, where consideration of any subject and intelligent discussion is impossible, and has been for years. That measure came here and found the distinguished Senator from Ohio and his party in control of this body. You assumed it; you took possession of every committee of the body and determined that you would have legislation as you wanted it. When you did it—speaking not only for myself, but for many of my associates on this side—I warned you that in the condition in which we were in this body you had not the power to relieve the country in all probability, and that you had better have come to us or permitted us to join you on some nonpartisan proposition. Our offer was rejected. You assumed the whole responsibility. You knew that your measures which came here could not pass. You knew that they were antagonistic to every Democratic idea. You knew that you had not the power on that side, unless you got all your forces together, to pass them. These propositions as they came to us, the whole matter as conducted, were intended for failure.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. GORMAN. Certainly.

Mr. SHERMAN. I most emphatically deny that statement. It was intended by that bill to furnish additional revenue for the support of the Government, controlled by an Administration which is not in harmony at all with the Republican party. We knew as well as anyone that we had not the power of passing that bill unless it was sanctioned at least by a portion of the Democratic party. We reported the bill to the Senate and they had it in their power at any time to have taken the bill up and changed it if it did not conform to their ideas. They might have proposed any amendments they chose to offer, and any amendment which, in my judgment, or in the judgment of this side of the Chamber, would have furnished sufficient revenue and would have provided sufficient means to defray the expenses of the Government would have been freely adopted. It was not a partisan bill. It was a bill that I would not have supported if we had a majority in both Houses of Congress. It was a bill intended simply to supply revenue for the support of a common Government, which ought to be supported whether its President be a Democrat or a Republican. But the Democratic party refused unanimously even to consider the bill. The bill might have been taken as reported from the committee and changed perhaps to suit their ideas somewhat.

It has been the desire of our party to furnish revenue for the support of the Government, and I say it is a disgrace to the Congress of the United States, and especially to the Senate of the United States, that when they knew full well that the receipts of the Government would not be adequate to pay the necessary expenses for the support of the Government, they refused to act upon it, refused to propose any amendments to it, but at once defeated the bill, and there it stood. And, sir, during this whole Administration, in every day, in every hour, in every month, and in every year of its entire term the receipts of the Government have been insufficient to support the Government; and yet the Democratic party, having control of the executive branch of the Government, refused to aid us in passing the necessary provisions for raising more revenue. Therefore, when the honorable Senator gets up here and lectures this side of the Chamber, I say we have done all that can be done while we are in the minority in this Chamber in order to secure sufficient revenue to meet the ordinary expenses of the Government and to avoid that which is worse than all in every Government—to have expenditures exceed receipts.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio, with his long experience in both Houses of Congress, knows as well and better than any Senator on this floor that there has not been, and there could not be, a possibility of passing a revenue bill with the votes of your political opponents in this body, unless it should be a bill that was adjusted and agreed to before it reached the body, a pure and simple revenue bill on lines outside of the questions upon which parties divide.

The Senator from Ohio knew perfectly well from what had been said that we on this side of the Chamber never could agree to the proposition presented by the Committee on Finance raising rates of duty until the measure amounted to a prohibitory tariff. The Senator knew when that bill was presented in the Chamber that no Democrat in it, in view of the past, could afford to reverse the action upon the wool schedule, for instance. Hence, when the bill was brought in here it was brought in as a party measure; it was brought in with perfect knowledge that the Democrats could not support it; it was brought in with perfect knowledge that you had rejected my tender, made to you publicly when you organized the committees, that you should take into consideration those of us on this side of the Chamber who would have liked to have cooperated with you to relieve the Treasury—not on party lines. That was rejected, and in the place of it you brought a bill that your own party associates, as well as nearly all of the Democrats, believe would not have increased the revenue and would not have satisfied either Republicans or Democrats.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator says that the committee could do what it pleased upon this subject. It is one of the remarkable incidents of this Congress that the Republican party placed under the control of the Democratic party practically the only committee which can consider and control a bill for raising revenue. There are as many Democrats on that committee as there are Republicans. It is not a Republican committee; and when we were called upon to organize the committees, it was known perfectly that we had not a majority; and, as I have said, that committee, which alone could propose amendments to revenue bills coming from the House of Representatives, was composed of an equal number of Democrats and Republicans, with one or two Senators representing the middle party, if I may call them so, or the Populist party, or whatever they may call themselves. [Laughter.] Therefore the Republican party in the only committee where the question of politics could enter in regard to the question of revenue had no more strength numerically than the Democratic party. We acknowledged the fact that we had not a majority. We therefore organized the committee composed of an equal number of Republicans and Democrats, with one or two others, and we had reason to suppose that the Democratic party, now representing the executive branch of the Government, would do what was right and fair. If amendments had been proposed to that bill they could have been voted upon in committee; and if the bill sent to us from the House of Representatives was not satisfactory, it could have been changed. Four or five Democrats voting with us would have secured an all-sufficient revenue to provide for the expenses of the Government. The Democratic party therefore are responsible.

The Senator says that we seized upon the committees. We did not. Never before in my service in the Senate Chamber were the committees so equally divided between the great political parties; never before was there so little partisanship shown in the organization of the committees. Look them over and you will find that, while we nominally have a majority of some of the committees, yet in the active, efficient committees, which control the very matters now complained of, the Democrats are practically equal to us, and they could have cooperated with us if they so desired.

Mr. STEWART. Before the Senator from Maryland proceeds, I want to inquire from him if he concedes in his argument that there is a necessity for more taxation, for more revenue? I understand that we have already too much revenue.

Mr. GORMAN. I hope to get to that later on.

Mr. STEWART. I hope so. I want to hear the Senator on that particular point.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, I confess my amazement at the statement of the distinguished Senator from Ohio. A great party such as he represents and of which he is one of the most conspicuous members has deliberately taken charge of the entire business of this body. Knowing the conditions and knowing the opinions of every member of it, taking the organization of the committees of this body, which control and shape legislation, knowing all the conditions, and rejecting our offer to join them upon nonpartisan lines, they have assumed the responsibility.

Mr. HALE. What was that offer? Will the Senator tell the Senate what was that offer; what was the swap and dicker that was proposed by the Senator from Maryland to the Republicans touching any of the great financial or fiscal questions? It is brand new to me. I never heard of it before.

Mr. GORMAN. No, Mr. President, I offered no dicker. I suggested that when you were about to take possession and take the responsibilities of the organization of the Senate, with the division that existed, it was not wise; that the committees ought to be divided not on party lines, but so shaped that we might come together on the great measures that were necessary for the relief of the Treasury.

Mr. HALE. The Senator will allow me. I remember that the Senator, when we were considering the subject of taking control of the committees and who should nominally have them, did suggest that it would be better that what he called "the best thought of the Senate" should come together on a kind of compromise.

Mr. GORMAN. Yes.

Mr. HALE. But certainly I did not suppose, and I do not think any Senator supposed for a moment, that the Senator was proposing any arrangement by which the two sides could get together, or a majority of the two sides, on the great financial and currency questions. It was simply the matter of organization. I do not deem very important the possibility of having a nominal majority. It is a thing that the country cares nothing about. The question is, have you votes enough in the body to pass any bills? And we confess that we have not the votes here.

Mr. GORMAN. I am utterly amazed that my friend from Maine should come in and help plead the baby act.

Mr. CHANDLER. I suppose the Senator will allow me to be amazed also by asking him to tell a little more explicitly, so that it may come to my dull apprehension, when it was said openly on the floor of the Senate that Senators on the other side of the Chamber—I mean the Democratic Senators—were willing to cooperate by an arrangement with the Republican Senators upon this side of the Chamber in the organization of the Senate? I never heard any suggestion of that kind, except a little, short remark of the Senator one day, that he had hoped that the Senate would have been controlled or organized "by the best thought of the Senate." That was not sufficient notice to me of any such proposed arrangement [laughter], I beg leave to say to the Senator.

Mr. GORMAN. That might have excluded, perhaps, the Senator as well as myself.

Mr. CHANDLER. That was the only notice I ever had; and if there was any other proposition in open Senate, it must have been when I was not here.

Mr. GORMAN. I know it was very distasteful to the Senator from New Hampshire, but I pass that over, because I am dealing with a more serious matter.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will ask another question, so that the Senator may answer both at the same time.

Every Democratic member of the Committee on Finance has well known and often expressed opinions on the question of the free coinage of silver, and yet every Democratic member of that committee selected by their associates on the Democratic side—because the Democrats on the committee were all selected by the other side of the Chamber—was in favor of the free coinage of silver, and thus interposed that great obstacle against any action in favor of final legislation desired by the Administration.

It is understood that this Administration is opposed to the free coinage of silver, and yet gentlemen on that side of the Chamber, having the power to select their own committee members, selected only those who were in hostility to the Administration on the most important question involved in the present politics of our day—that is, the free coinage of silver.

Mr. GORMAN. If the Senator will pardon me, I am not going into the discussion of free silver. That is a question that will be determined later on by other bodies, it seems to me, when that question will come before the country.

I am dealing now with what the Senator's party is doing and has done in Congress. You know that you have the power to frame revenue measures. They have been framed on such lines that it was known when they were framed they never could pass this body as at present organized. They came here and went to the Finance Committee, of which the Senator from Ohio is a shining light, a committee the majority of which upon the tariff question agree with the Senator from Ohio, and they were elected as Republicans by the Republican legislatures of their respective States. The committee is absolutely controlled by a majority of Senators for whom the Republican party is responsible.

Mr. HALE. How does the Senator figure that out?

Mr. GORMAN. I will read the list.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not like to mention the names of Senators, but the Senator from Maryland is not correct in that statement.

Mr. GORMAN. Let us see, Mr. President. Reading names in this body may be out of order, but there can be no question about the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] having been elected as a Republican.

Mr. SHERMAN. We recognize him.

Mr. GORMAN. And according to all the accounts I have had from the time I can remember anything the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] has been a Republican; and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES] was elected by a Republican legislature and sent here in the beginning as a Republican.

Mr. PLATT. Oh, no.

Mr. SHERMAN. But he has taken a different position, as is well known. I do not wish to mention names, but he represents what is called the Third Party, and not the Republican party.

Mr. GORMAN. The Senator from Nevada was placed on the Committee on Finance long before the silver question became as prominent as it is now. He came here by the action of the Republican party, and on the question of taxation, so far as his views have been known, they are those of a sound Republican. There is not a Democratic idea in his head, so far as I know, as to the modes of conducting and levying taxation. Run down the list, and you find the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT], and the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT], all of whom are Republicans, were elected as Republicans, and were placed upon that committee as Republicans at this Congress.

There is the organization. Every Republican in the body voting for it, aided by the refusal to vote of my distinguished friend from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PERFER], and probably the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BUTLER]—not a Democrat voting for it, but a solid Republican vote. You took the responsibility, and you knew that it is not possible to pass your measures unless you again brought all these gentlemen who cooperated with you in the organization of the body up to voting for your bills. You presented a bill distasteful in every line to every Democratic Senator.

I am not unduly arraigning the Senator from Ohio or the Senator from Maine or my good friend from New Hampshire, who was possibly more active in the matter of organization than either of the others. I have seen the time within two years upon this floor when the Senator from Ohio rose in his seat, when we were in trouble to get together upon the silver question, upon which the division is so sharp that there is no compromise at present, and on which your party is divided as our party is divided, when it was a question whether we would repeal the law known as the Sherman law, and when we did not know what to do except to appeal to you to aid us, a part of your votes upon the main proposition were always given; but when we were hesitating, when we were most anxious, what did the Senator from Ohio say to us? I will read it. In October, 1893, after that long struggle, and after chiding us for not getting together, he said:

In times past, when they were in the minority and we were in the majority, we never shrank from responsibility. We were Republicans because we believed in Republican principles and Republican men and Republican measures, and whenever a question came into the Senate Chamber to be decided we never pleaded the baby act and said, "We could not agree." We met together in conclave, we measured each other's opinions, some giving away, and finally we came to an agreement. In this way we passed all the great laws which have marked the history of the last thirty years of our country, and it was not done by begging votes of the other side. We knew that by the usual and almost universal habit of the Democratic party they would oppose anything we should propose, even the Lord's Commandments or the Lord's Prayer.

Therefore the Senator from Ohio knew perfectly at the beginning of the present session that your partisan legislation, your Republican legislation upon Republican lines, could not meet the support of a Democrat upon this side of the body. You knew that you had rejected the tender to join you to relieve the Treasury on nonpartisan lines. I say to the Senator from Ohio that no proposition has ever come from his party—none will be offered now—to relieve the condition of the Treasury by imposing a tax upon articles that are not in controversy between the two parties.

Mr. HALE. Let me ask the Senator from Maryland, because he has referred again—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. GORMAN. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. This time, in more definitive language than before, the Senator has referred to a proposition that came from the other side to join this side upon some measure which might relieve the Treasury. I wish the Senator would state the circumstance, the time, the occasion, and the proposition to that effect, from whom it came, if made, whom it represented, and how many votes it represented upon the other side of the Chamber. Because if the Senate is amazed at what is said here upon this side this morning, certainly many of us are amazed now at being told that an authoritative proposition came from the other side of the Chamber to join with this side upon some measure that should relieve the Treasury. I for one have never known of it or heard of it. With all the ability and with all the experience and the conceded sagacity and great capacity of leadership on the part of the Senator from Maryland, I doubt, Mr. President, whether he stands to-day with authority to propose for a majority or any more than a small minority of his party any proposition that involves the great currency and financial question; and I doubt whether from the beginning the Senator, with all the prestige that he carries, conceded in the country, has been in a position where he could make any proposition of that kind from his party.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, it is a little difficult for me to remember all that has been said upon the other side, but I want to bring the Senator back (for a Senator in front of me has kindly looked up the RECORD) to the suggestion I made when you took possession of the committees of this body. In answer to the distinguished Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], as appears in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of December 30, 1895, page 427, I stated:

Mr. President, I confess my amazement at the distinguished Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], who, with his party friends on the other side of the Chamber, has been most anxious to assume responsibility by taking charge of the main committees of this body, and yet, before the committees are organized, proclaims to the country that they have no power to carry out the decrees of their party.

From this time henceforth Senators on the other side of the Chamber are responsible for the action of both branches of Congress. The Republicans came here knowing that they had not a clear majority in the Senate. By common consent provision was made at the last session of Congress for this very condition of affairs, knowing that it was absolutely necessary to make such concessions as had never before been made in the Senate, for such a condition, where a few gentlemen hold the balance of power, had existed but once before in the history of this body. In that condition, as I understood it and as I supposed the other side meant it, the resolution was adopted, in order that this great body might adjust its committees on more liberal lines as between the two parties, on a line which would have secured for the country the consideration of measures in committee by the best thought of both sides of the Chamber, without reference to the third party.

That statement was made in the open Senate.

Mr. HALE. I remember that distinctly, and there is no proposition whatever that would either bind the Senator or any of his associates upon that side as to any proposition touching these great measures. The Senator was talking, and all of us considered that he was talking, upon the organization of the Senate. He was indulging in reproaches such as have frequently come from the other side against this side of the Chamber for taking nominal possession of the committees. But everybody always understood that that possession was only nominal. Certainly I have the right now to make the inquiry of the Senator when he, at this stage of the proceedings, intimates that there was a proposition that any portion of his party could be got together with the Republican party to frame and pass any measure touching the great currency and financial questions. That was not ever considered or ever proposed by the Senator. What he has read bears out all that I have stated. He was dealing only with the little affair—the leather and prunella—of the organization of the committees of this body and not with the great questions that the country is interested in.

Mr. GORMAN. I confess my great surprise at the last statement of the distinguished Senator from Maine, that I was dealing with the small affair of the mere organization of the committees. That is as far from being the fact as it is possible for a statement to be. We cared nothing about the organization of the committees, as is shown in this very statement that I made, and it was done with the full consent, as I understand, of every Senator on this side of the Chamber. We were in the minority and we recognized it. We did not desire the committees, but we knew and stated to you publicly that you probably had not sufficient numbers in the body to control legislation, and therefore, in the interest of the great public questions, if you took possession in that condition, you must assume the responsibility. I said:

But the desire for power, the anxiety to control committees and keep the legislation in their hands, have made the Republicans take a step which possibly will not give them the power of legislation, but they have taken the responsibility.

Mr. HALE. Now, Mr. President, that is precisely what the Senator did. He never made any proposition, but declared that the responsibility was with us. If the Senator is still of the same impression that he, for himself, or for his party, or some portion of it, did a little private wooing with the Republican party and invited them into some sort of compact or agreement, or arrangement, or nuptials, I should like to have him specify after that had been done and had been accepted what kind of a measure does he think would have been framed that could have passed this body, or what kind of measure does he think now could be framed and pass this body?

Mr. GORMAN. At that time I had great hopes of it, but I confess, after being here from December until now with the Republican party, I have absolutely none. I do not believe from what I have seen that there is any measure on the face of the earth that you would agree to that the Democrats could vote for.

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator believe that at that time he represented his party upon these great questions—I do not say the admitted leadership on the floor, but upon these great measures that touch, for instance, the coinage of free silver at a ratio of 16 to 1? I want him to state here in the Senate whom he represented at that time and what guarantee he had then that any arrangement could be made by which, upon that great subject, there could be any measure passed through this body; or, going further than that, will he outline now any measure that he believes would have got a majority in this body for the relief of the Treasury.

Mr. GORMAN. I have stated once before that upon the matter of the silver question the Senator from Maine and the Senate and the country know that this body by a clear and emphatic majority voted in favor of the increased use of silver, and the lines are not divided on the two sides of the Chamber.

Mr. HALE. No.

Mr. GORMAN. Your side is divided, and I eliminated the question of the coinage of silver. The Senator brings it in for the purpose, it appears to me, as if he might divert me from the line I am on of the other great question, that of the depletion of the Treasury.

Mr. HALE. No; I do not. But I will ask further, that being the case as he has stated, supposing the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] and the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY], the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS] and any other Senators upon the other side, had met in friendly conference with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], and other recognized financial lights upon this side, and had reported any measure for the relief of the Treasury, does the Senator believe that that bill could have been passed without the majority that he says exists in this body for free silver putting on it an amendment that provided for the free coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1? I ask the Senator whether the fact he has stated here, that a majority of this body is in favor of the free coinage of silver, and not only in favor of it, but dominates all other issues to that, is not the paralysis that rests upon this body, that it is utterly unable to pass any act for the relief of the Treasury or a revenue measure that will not be loaded with a free-silver arrangement? Does the Senator believe that he could have reported any bill that would not have been so loaded? Does the Senator believe that if this advance that he says was made had been agreed to on this side and a bill had been reported it would not have been loaded with a free-silver amendment? What does the Senator think?

Mr. GORMAN. That is a mere matter of speculation. In the condition in which the Treasury is—

Mr. HALE. It has been demonstrated more than once.

Mr. GORMAN. On one proposition, but I do not know, with the views of Senators who are in favor of the coinage of silver at 16 to 1, whether they would antagonize a measure that was nonpartisan, that was intended only to get money into the Treasury to meet the wants of that Department. We have not made the effort, and that will be decided when we come to it.

Mr. HALE. That has been demonstrated more than once by a yea-and-nay vote of the body; and the ground of my adverting to it is the Senator's statement himself, as he looked over both sides of this Chamber, that a majority here was clearly for the free coinage of silver.

Mr. GORMAN. Supposed to be.

Mr. HALE. That is what we are resting under.

Mr. GORMAN. The votes have shown that.

Mr. HALE. The votes have shown that.

Mr. GORMAN. And right in the face of that proposition, with that knowledge, here is what the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] said, speaking for his side in the same debate when you assumed the responsibility:

I rose for one thing—

Said the Senator from New Hampshire—simply to say to those Senators who are so agonized and distressed at the responsibility which has been this day assumed by this side of the Chamber that the responsibility will be cheerfully undertaken. We shall take it with the incidental comforts and pleasures—

Mr. HALE. That is true.

and benefits which go along with it, with an equanimity which will be astonishing to the Senator from Tennessee. The Republican party is not afraid of responsibility; it never has been afraid of responsibility in all its history.

Mr. HALE. Now, Mr. President, following that out as the Senator from Ohio has so clearly outlined, the party accepted a proposition that came from its representatives in the other House, a measure for the relief of the Treasury. It took the responsibility. It reported it to this body. It endeavored to pass it. There is no need of sticking further in the bark in this matter. We did not have votes enough to pass it. We had the solid Democratic vote arrayed against us. We had the Populist vote added to that. We had certain so-called silver Republicans who believed that the greatest and highest issue was silver and not the relief of the Treasury, and we were bound hand and foot. The Senator from New Hampshire did not misstate when he said we would undertake the responsibility. He did not state in those remarks that he believed we had a majority. All that we could do was to try and see if we could get a majority.

Mr. President, this is the whole outcome of the matter. There will never be any measure passed for the relief of the Treasury, for the protection of American industries, or for sound finances until one more appeal to the people gives to the Republican party a House of Representatives, as it has got now, a pure Republican majority in this body, which it has not got now, and a Republican seated in the White House. All the talk of reproach as to what is being done or what is not being done goes for nothing until that final appeal is made to the people next November. There will be nothing done until that is granted; and if the people do not grant that and the situation remains as it is now, we will go on in the same way, and it may be that we shall have to borrow money again, as we have been borrowing under the Democratic Administration. That is all there is in the question.

Mr. ALLEN. I think it is due to the Populist party, in reply to the Senator from Maine, to say that the Republican party in this Chamber since it has taken possession of it has always had the power to pass such reasonable revenue measure as it saw fit to present to the Senate. The Republican party was permitted to take possession of the organization of the Senate for the express purpose of casting the responsibility for legislation upon the Republican party in both branches of Congress. It was no matter of affection upon the part of the Populists for Republicans that the Republicans were suffered to take possession of the organization. It was repeatedly announced; it was announced at the time of the organization; it has been announced since by proper authority, that whenever the Republican party presents to this Chamber a measure for the relief of the country that is in keeping with the express declaration of its platform of 1892 they will receive Populist votes enough to make that measure a law.

Mr. HALE. I suppose the Senator is correct—

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator from Maine must remember that in the House of Representatives the Republican party has a majority of over 100.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes.

Mr. HALE. I suppose the Senator is correct, that if the Republican party had framed a revenue bill which would suit the Senator from Nebraska and his associates in what is known and what is the Populist party, and if the Republican party had voted with those three Populists or five Populists, it would have passed undoubtedly. When the Senator says that they would have voted for any measure that in their judgment means a measure for the relief of the American people he means a Populist measure. The Republican party never has proposed that and I do not presume ever will. That is not possible. I might as well say that if the Senator from Nebraska, with his Populist associates, would vote with the Republicans for our bill we could pass it; but we were never able to get their votes and they will never be able to get our votes for their measure. So the Senate is hung in deadlock. That is all there is about it.

Mr. ALLEN. No; Mr. President, if the Senator from Maryland will permit me, in making the statement I did at the time of the reorganization of the Senate, I did not refer to Populist measures at all. We realized that the country was in a bad condition. I think we realize it and that we realized it then as fully as the Senator from Maine or any other Senator in this Chamber. I do remember, however, distinctly that at that time the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] and the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] stated openly in this Chamber, each of them using the expression that it would be good policy to organize this Chamber upon the lines of the best thought on the subject of finance—

Mr. HALE. The Senator goes a little too far there.

Mr. ALLEN. Assuming, I suppose—

Mr. HALE. It was not said—

Mr. ALLEN. If the Senator will allow me to finish the sentence I will yield. Assuming, I suppose, in that discussion that a certain element of the Republican party and a certain element of the Democratic party had a monopoly of knowledge upon the subject of the best thought upon financial questions. Now I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. HALE. The Senator has put an addendum on that proposition which was not conveyed at the time. There was some talk about the best thought of the Senate combining in the organization, but there was never anything which went to show that that was intended to convey a proposition with regard to the finances and the currency. Undoubtedly, Mr. President, there was some question of division of sentiment among Republicans and Democrats as to the advisability of nominally taking possession of the committees. Some Republicans did not believe in that. It looked to me like an ignis fatuus, as if nothing would come of it. But the general sentiment was that as we were in a plurality it belonged to the Republicans if to anybody. However, nobody thought that that carried with it the power to pass measures. Senators need not spend any more time on the old question of taking possession of the committees. The real question was when measures were framed and presented to the Senate for deliberation and action did we have votes enough to pass them, and evidently we did not.

Mr. ALLEN. I call the attention of the Senator from Maine to the fact that within the last six weeks, at least within the last two months, the Populist party in this Chamber has distinctly announced to you that they would accept your revenue measure passed in the House of Representatives, known as the Dingley bill, word for word, without the elimination of a letter or a word, if you would fulfill your promise to the country made in 1892 in favor of the free coinage of silver, and you distinctly declined to do it.

Mr. HALE. There the Senator has told the whole story better than I can tell it. The pistol was put at our heads. We were told if we would consent to the free coinage of silver at 16 to 1 that such a measure could be passed. The majority of the Republicans rejected that proposition, and I am very glad they did, Mr. President.

Mr. CHANDLER. I should like to ask the Senator from Nebraska a question.

Mr. GORMAN. Now, Mr. President—

Mr. PALMER. May I interfere at this point with an interruption? I have witnessed on this floor the dickering between two powerful, corrupt, and greedy interests, the one for protection, for the tariff, and the other for protection to free silver, to an extent that I had never expected to see in the American Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. Will the Senator from Maryland allow me to refer to the measure he has alluded to?

Mr. GORMAN. With pleasure.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should be gratified beyond expression if now, even at this late period of the session, the revenue bill as it came to us from the House of Representatives should be taken up by this body and changed so as to meet and command a majority of the body. I have here before me that bill. It is not a partisan bill; it simply advances the rates of certain schedules, naming them, some of them being advanced 15 per cent and some of them 10 per cent. It is in no sense a protective-tariff bill, but it is purely a revenue-tariff bill.

There is another thing to which I wish to call attention. The whole of that simple bill from the House of Representatives was stricken out by a vote of the Committee on Finance, and I feel justified in saying now, since the Senator has spoken of the methods of that committee, that every Democratic member of the Committee on Finance voted to strike out the whole provision and substitute in its place the free coinage of silver. We were only of equal number when my friend the Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES] voted with them upon the subject. Although he is a strong tariff man, yet he is in favor of the free coinage of silver. So a measure for the free coinage of silver was presented to the Senate as a substitute for the tariff bill. What more could we do? What more could be done by our party? We had not a majority.

Mr. HAWLEY. Allow me to call the Senator's attention to the fact that after they had swapped the horse for the yellow dog they killed the yellow dog. They all joined to refuse to take up the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have nothing to do with the yellow dog, if they have killed it.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President—

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not wish to interrupt my friend, the Senator from Maryland, further. However, I will say that the Senate of the United States should rise above all these petty political questions of the day, take up the tariff bill, strike from it the provision for silver coinage, and make provisions for increased revenue. I do not care what it is, anything that would relieve us from the danger and dishonor of carrying on the Government of the country without sufficient revenue.

When in the Senate of the United States, a great deliberative body, there is a large majority of Senators who are in favor of furnishing sufficient revenue to carry on the Government, why do we not do it when we have the bill before us? We can not originate a bill of this kind.

Mr. GORMAN. I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio a question, for this is the first intimation, public or private, which I have ever heard that the Senator is of that frame of mind. Would he agree to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and to put a revenue duty upon tea and coffee sufficient to bring $30,000,000 into the Treasury?

Mr. SHERMAN. No; I would not, for I would not throw the whole burden of taxation upon those who consume tea and coffee.

Mr. GORMAN. Why?

Mr. SHERMAN. It would not be fair or just to do it. But I am willing to take up the bill and provide for raising the requisite taxation from foreign goods to carry on the operation of the Government and place us beyond the danger of a deficiency every year and the sale of bonds every six months.

Mr. SQUIRE. Mr. President—

Mr. GORMAN. I must be permitted to go on a little while. I would really like to get through this afternoon, if I can.

As a matter of course I assumed, and now I know, that it would not be possible for the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] or any other Republican Senator from Ohio or any Republican statesman from that section of the country, in view of their party hopes and anticipations, to abandon the McKinley rates. I knew perfectly well, and we all know, that the bill which the Senator holds in his hand not only restores the McKinley rates in most cases or in many cases, but goes beyond it. The entire legislation of the party which the distinguished Senator from Ohio represents is a forecast of what the country is to expect—great appropriations, greater than any revenue that you will have in the next few years; contracts provided for to an extent never heard of before in an American Congress; a depleted Treasury; all the proceeds of the bonds already sold will go if the appropriation bills are to pass in the shape in which they are presented. Then what will come when that Congress is to assemble which the Senator from Maine described—an overwhelming majority of Republicans in the House of Representatives, a clear Republican majority here that would follow the lead of the distinguished Senator from Ohio, a man in the executive branch of the Government who would sign a bill no matter how high the rates imposed, even to prohibition? That is the spectacle which will be presented to the country. It is the policy of your party. Your organization of this body and the other meant that from the beginning, and it means nothing else.

I am not surprised that the Senator from Ohio declines to agree to put a tax upon tea and coffee, notwithstanding the fact that it is a pure revenue duty, for he knows that when the tax was taken off coffee the price to the consumer was increased instead of diminished. The country from which it is shipped placed an initial duty on it. There is not a dealer in tea in the United States who does not know that we get nothing but the lowest grade of tea. There is not a dealer who does not know that you can put a duty of 3 cents a pound on tea without increasing the price to the consumer one-half penny in a thousand-dollar expenditure. It is a pure revenue matter. That is what I would agree to. Such a measure I believe you can pass through this body to meet the deficiency, unless you intend to force the sale of bonds or force your party to increase the McKinley rates when we meet in the next Congress.

The pressure to sell bonds comes not alone upon the Republican party, but, I regret to say, it came to our party. It was forced on us. The sale of our bonds never has and never can meet with my approbation. I have never believed that in time of peace any party which increases the public debt can live in the country. I have stood here always in favor of measures that would give revenue enough to prevent the sale of bonds, but it began not with the Democratic party. It began with the Republican party's legislation which created the necessity. It began with the bill known as the McKinley tariff act, which took effect November, 1890, and by June, 1891, the revenues fell off $10,000,000, and in the next year they fell off $53,000,000. The increase in the payments on account of pensions was from $106,000,000 to $118,000,000 in 1891, in 1892 $141,000,000, and in 1893 $158,000,000. In 1894 it was painfully evident that the tariff act of 1890 as a revenue measure was a failure.

We had entered, in addition, upon the construction of the Navy and the other great public works of the country. It left a deficit in the Treasury which enabled the men who were anxious to invest in Government bonds to force the Treasury to sell.

That, Mr. President, it seems to me, is what we are coming to now. Why is it, I ask the Senator from Ohio, that where his party has supreme control, in the other branch of Congress, where all revenue bills and appropriation bills originate, where they are supposed to be considered, where they know the condition of the Treasury, where they know that there is no balance on hand except the proceeds of the sale of the bonds to the syndicate, which you denounce so roundly—why is it that your party has framed bills that come here amounting in the appropriations—money that is to go out of the Treasury in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897—to $505,778,070.43? In making up the appropriation bills they have appropriated for public works, for rivers and harbors, for only eight months in the year in order that that amount, great as it is, $505,000,000, might be reduced on the face of the papers. For the courts, jurors, and all the paraphernalia connected with the United States courts they have appropriated for only six months, when the rule always is to appropriate for a year. Why was that done? Simply because they were afraid of the effect upon the country if they exceeded these enormous figures of $505,000,000. They knew that this body would be forced to add to that sum, as the requirements of the Government would make it absolutely necessary, fifteen to twenty million dollars. That makes $60,000,000 more than your revenue. Why does your party do it? Is not the Senator from Ohio aware of the fact that the Secretary of the Treasury has said to Congress:

While the situation—

Speaking of the actual money in the Treasury—

does not require any legislation for raising additional revenue—

For he has the proceeds from the sale of bonds—

by taxation at this time, it is such as to require the strictest economy in appropriations and public expenditures.

And yet we have before us a bill authorizing the expenditure of $51,000,000 for the Navy, in time of absolute peace, prepared by the party on the other side.

At a time—

Says the Secretary—

When the people, upon whom the expense of sustaining the Government is imposed, are compelled to practice the closest economy in their business and domestic affairs in order to meet their obligations and reestablish their trade and industries, it is more than ever the duty of the public authorities to avoid waste and extravagance in the appropriation and disbursement of the revenues. Nearly every appropriation is in terms, or by necessary implication, a direction to the executive authorities to expend the money, and therefore the responsibility for an increase or reduction of expenditures rests primarily and mainly upon Congress. It is certain that if appropriations are not made the money will not be expended, and, for the reason just stated, it is almost equally certain that if appropriations are made the money must be expended. The power of the executive officials to reduce expenditures is limited to the comparatively few cases in which the disbursement is left to their discretion, and, however judiciously this discretion may be exercised, the effect upon the total outlay is scarcely appreciable.

In the face of that declaration your appropriations will amount to $520,000,000, with an estimated revenue of $464,000,000. That is not all you have done. To make it perfectly certain that taxes must be increased hereafter or more bonds sold, you have added other provisions to the bills that come to the Senate. In that branch you have a clear majority, not as in this body a doubtful majority. There you have a clear and unquestioned majority. You have added provisions authorizing contracts to be made by the Treasury Department, the War Department, and the Navy Department amounting to $84,638,486. There, for the first time, in one session is nearly $600,000,000 appropriated and contracted for.

I ask the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] in charge of the bill how he can defend a proposition to appropriate sixteen million, yes, twenty-three million, dollars for ships and armor not now needed, for which there is no pressing necessity, when you have not the money? The Secretary of the Treasury will, I think, be compelled to sell more bonds, and he who votes for these unnecessary appropriations, unnecessary in the sense of not being required for the safety of the Government or to carry it on, votes for more bonds. No Senator can escape his full share of responsibility on either side of the Chamber. The Department can not suspend them, says the Secretary of the Treasury, when you make the appropriations.

Mr. Herbert, the Secretary of the Navy, in his anxiety to be the greatest admiral of the greatest fleet there has ever been in this country and to rival that of other nations, says, "Give it to me, because there is money in the Treasury." Yes, it is the money of the people that is in the Treasury, money obtained by a mortgage on their industries.

Mr. VEST. Will the Senator from Maryland permit me to call his attention to the exact figures as to the river and harbor bill, to which he refers?

Mr. GORMAN. I shall be glad to have the Senator from Missouri read them.

Mr. WHITE. The bill has been reported to the Senate?

Mr. VEST. The bill was reported yesterday. Here is the amount contained in the bill as stated in the report of the chairman of the committee. The amount of actual cash appropriations in the bill is $12,614,550. The amount of continuing appropriations is $60,623,871.91.

Mr. GRAY. What is the amount of the cash appropriations?

Mr. VEST. Twelve million six hundred and fourteen thousand five hundred and fifty dollars direct immediate appropriations, and the amount of the continuing appropriations is $60,623,871.91. The addition, of course, can be made very easily.

Mr. GORMAN. With the figures just read by the distinguished Senator from Missouri, and I thank him for the interruption, the total amount of the appropriations and obligations that will be created by this Congress will be $900,000,000. That will make the greatest appropriation, including obligations authorized, which has ever passed through an American Congress.

It is said that the country is growing and the expenditures must increase. I agree to it. I agree that the country is growing and that so long as the pension legislation is on the statute books it is difficult to cut down the appropriations lower than they were during the past fiscal year. In some cases there must be increases. While the river and harbor bill may have its defects, it is more important to the people of the country than the naval bill. There you give an opportunity for commerce, for the people to send their wares hence and to receive whatever they want from abroad. It cheapens transportation; it breaks down monopoly; it is commerce; it is trade. A reasonable increase upon that item may be tolerated, will be tolerated.

But why, I ask Senators upon the other side, do you insist on spending $23,000,000 on the Navy for great battle ships when five years from now it is questionable whether the same types of ships will be built? How can you afford to do it with the condition of the Treasury? It is said we have $170,000,000 in the Treasury besides the reserve of $100,000,000 to redeem the greenbacks.

Mr. SQUIRE. May I ask the Senator from Maryland a question in regard to the revenue? I should like to ask him whether or not it is true that there is a deficiency in the revenue caused by the method of valuation of importations?

Mr. GORMAN. I have no doubt—

Mr. SQUIRE. Is it not necessary that there should be a correction of the evils existing. It has been stated to me by a Democrat, one of the prominent inspectors of customs, that there is a very large loss to the Government by reason of difficulty in administering the law because of the ad valorem duties instead of specific rates.

Mr. GORMAN. I do not intend to go into the matter of defects in the tariff bill. I will tell the Senator, because I happen to have the matter in my hand, what the trouble is; and I appeal to him now to aid me to correct it.

From 1891 to 1895 (this includes the last Administration as well as the present one) your revenues were only $2,109,304,756.78. Your appropriations by Congress were $2,508,277,860.66. In other words, Congress from 1891 to 1895, inclusive, appropriated $398,973,104.08 more than all your revenue. To meet those payments the Secretary of the Treasury (he was wise in doing it; it would have been criminal, in my judgment, had he not done it) took from the money which he received from the sale of bonds and has paid up to this date, by the statement I have, which is from the Treasury Department, $163,160,803.32. He has now in the Treasury $170,000,000. Everybody is trying to get it. There is not a single manufacturer of iron or steel who is content with moderate appropriations. There is not an interest which deals with the Government that does not look at the statement of the Secretary of the Navy, made to the House of Representatives, that we have plenty of money (a most unfortunate statement, in my judgment), that has not been after this supposed surplus. It does not exist, except on paper. There is $116,000,000 owing by this Government for all sorts of purposes, where the matters have been suspended and not paid. Suspended why? As the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] said from his side, and said properly, under that condition he would apply the heroic remedy and refuse to expend when Congress appropriated. If Mr. Carlisle had not pursued that policy the Treasury would have been unable to meet its debt without the sale of more bonds than have already been sold.

The Senator from Ohio says we are responsible, because we did not put enough revenue in the Treasury. I stood here for more revenue at some little disadvantage to my own personal affairs, with a good deal of misrepresentation, a good deal of misunderstanding all around among my party associates, because I knew, as I thought, and as the figures have since shown, that all the estimates that were then made were not correct; that we had not revenue enough. I voted to increase it forty, fifty, and sixty million dollars. I wish to state frankly that, notwithstanding the most extraordinary decision of the Supreme Court of the United States upon a tax which did not meet with my personal approval, if the tax had been declared constitutional I do not believe the tariff bill as we passed it would have furnished up to this time sufficient money to pay these most extraordinary appropriations. I know it would not have begun to pay the appropriations contained in the bills of this Congress. Therefore I say, without the slightest hesitation, that if a revenue measure were before this body to-day, and my party were in power, I should vote to put more revenue in the Treasury by $75,000,000 than is contained in that bill, for the reason that I believe there is only one rule for a successful man or a city or a corporation or a government to pursue, and that is to have revenue enough to pay your current expenses.

Mr. GRAY. Keep your expenses within your revenue.

Mr. GORMAN. Keep your expenses within your revenue. I agree to that; and that is what I am urging now, so far as we can. You can not accomplish it, but you can prevent the deficit from running up to $100,000,000. I am appealing to the Senate to cut off these appropriations. No man on this side of the Chamber, or on the other, has been more earnestly in favor of making liberal appropriations to create these great shipyards and steel plants than I have been. Ninety-five million dollars' increase for the Navy has gone to it. Where is the American, from Maine to California, who begrudges a penny of that money? You now have plants that make the best ships which float upon the ocean. The possibility of our commerce and the construction of vessels equal to those produced on the Clyde is not a dream. It was when John Roach urged it upon Congress. It is now a reality. The two great vessels that came from the Cramps' yards, the St. Louis and the St. Paul, were constructed at a cost not more than 15 per cent greater than vessels of like class would cost on the Clyde. They are manned by American officers.

There stand the great works at Bath, at New York, on the Delaware, in the town of my friend the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY], and at Baltimore, and the equal of them all in equipment at Newport News; the splendid yard on the Pacific. Those yards and works are ready for any emergency, either for commerce or for war. No man, as I said a moment ago, who has an American thought, begrudges a dollar of the money that has gone to create these marvelous enterprises. The men who have made the steel at Bethlehem and near Pittsburgh have the establishments. They are entitled to them. The people have paid for them generously. Why should they now come to Congress, taking advantage possibly of a war sentiment—for they have power through the press to create a war sentiment—and in the height of the excitement, with a depleted Treasury, come and demand $26,000,000 more than the ordinary appropriations? The Republican party, through patriotism, say give it to them, when they acknowledge that they are impotent to put another dollar into the Treasury, and yet you support this bill and the bills which are to follow it.

Mr. President, the responsibility is upon the other side of the Chamber. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] was quite right when he said they were not afraid to take it. You take the responsibility, and these great interests will take all the money which the Treasury can furnish.

I have endeavored to ascertain what the real motive was and what the argument was of gentlemen who are asking these extraordinary increases. I knew there was a sentiment, a substantial one and a proper one, in the country that we had gone with the Navy away in advance of the land fortifications; that on our seacoasts and on the Lakes we had not many modern guns in place; that we were without fortifications anywhere upon our coasts, and our great cities were helpless so far as armament was concerned. I knew that following this naval bill was to come another measure for the construction of these great monsters of war, 6, 12, 14, and 16 inch cannon, already too long delayed. It is impossible with the present feeling and with the present needs to stay that, and ten to fifteen millions must be expended on that line. This will afford employment for the manufacturers of steel. That alone will keep their furnaces going for the next three years, coupled with two ships of the Navy, the usual number that we build. The builders, the constructors of the vessels, of course would not have quite so much to do, but I ask, in the name of reason, why the men who are in interest should press this undue appropriation?

One of the supporters of this naval bill says that—

Our country must build up the Navy, keep it at a proper standard, and then there will be no occasion for thrilling the heart of our nation by a dynamite message. It is true that we are confronted with a depleted Treasury. But what has that to do with it? If the Administration is bankrupt, the country is not. There are loyal hearts and plenty of money among the 70,000,000 people living under the folds of our flag who will gladly and cheerfully indorse any outlay to build up the marine arm of our country's service and make it what it ought to be. I hope every Administration from now on will consider it a national duty, to wit, that the Army and Navy shall be the last two Departments to economize upon.

Mr. President, that may be patriotic; it certainly will find willing listeners among the men who furnish the materials for making these great instruments of war; but what will be said by the man who is struggling now to obtain a living, who finds the products of his land not bringing sufficient to pay his grocery bill? The American people patriotic! Mr. President, there is no question about it. They want a Navy; they have a Navy; they want it increased, but they do not want extravagance in that increase. They want a gradual increase; they want it made as the revenues will justify it.

Mr. President, I have an old-fashioned Democratic idea that the Army and Navy ought to be kept in time of peace at the lowest possible point which the safety of the country will allow; that it is not wise to have a great standing army or a navy which will be a menace to other countries. We need a navy sufficient to protect our own interests, without attempting to rival any of the great powers who live, and can only live, by the protection of the guns of their navy and their army. Ours is a strong structure, built and to be maintained by the good will of the people, and without standing armies to protect them. Our people have been able for a hundred years to meet every emergency which came, no matter how great that emergency.

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the Senator permit me just one word there? I do not wish to interrupt him in his speech.

Mr. GORMAN. Let me finish this sentence.

Here, Mr. President, for the first time in a time of peace, comes a Secretary of the Navy, who comes into power because of the success of Democratic ideas as we supposed, anxious to command a large number of ships. We gave them to him, and a splendid lot they are; and in a time of peace, last year, he said, "The Navy must be increased in men; we want to have as many men on board of one of these war vessels as a British admiral has on his. We have the ships; now give me 2,000 more men. That is only a million dollars a year." Congress gave him a thousand men, a half million dollars, and at this Congress, early in the recent war scare, manufactured or real, as you please, he comes to Congress and recommends the increase of that force 2,500 men more, and a thousand more for the Marine Corps, all of which serve upon those vessels, requiring from a million to a million and a half dollars. This Senate absolutely passed a bill for a thousand men, and in this bill we have voted a thousand more and 500 marines. In time of peace, to keep these vessels going, an increase of 3,000 men is made within a year, greater than ever before in the history of the country.

But that is not all. In 1795 Congress passed an act authorizing the President to call out the militia in cases of invasion. No such provision was ever contemplated in the Navy. There Congress held the power in its hands, because, when the Navy is to be used, that means war with a foreign country, and Congress alone can declare war. This Administration asked for a provision to enlist additional men in the Navy—a most extraordinary one—and I only name it to show how the thing is going on and how we are increasing and how we are going as the French Government goes and as the German Government goes and as all the European Governments go—making this a great military and naval power, ready not only to take care of our own affairs, but to assume a sort of protectorate over all that portion of the world south of us, which would mean a speedy war.

So the bill provided—

That whenever an exigency may exist which, in the judgment of the President, renders their services necessary, the Secretary of the Navy is further authorized—

Besides enlisting these 1,000 men—to enlist, for a period of two years, unless sooner discharged, such of the Naval Militia and other men as may be required for the purpose of manning vessels of the Navy not having full crews and such other ships as under laws now existing or under the authority conferred by section 4 of this act the President may decide to call into service.

Then there is a provision for the Secretary of the Navy to take any number of ships which he desires of the commercial marine. It is perfectly natural for these naval officers, restive and with no promotion, to want war. They want to test these ships. There is not one of them—and it is human nature—who is not ready and anxious to see how his ship will behave in action. Remember that this very bill which I have read passed this body and had the indorsement of the Secretary of the Navy, and he urged it upon Congress. Such power never was granted before, and never ought to be granted to any President, no matter who he may be—whether a Republican, a Democrat, or a member of the Third Party, if we should ever have one of that party.

The act of 1795 gave the President the power to call out the militia. Section 1643 of the Revised Statutes provides that—

Whenever the United States are invaded, or are in imminent danger of invasion from any foreign nation or Indian tribe, or of rebellion against the authority of the Government of the United States, it shall be lawful for the President to call forth such number of the militia of the State or States, most convenient to the place of danger or scene of action, as he may deem necessary to repel such invasion or to suppress such rebellion, and to issue his orders for that purpose to such officers of the militia as he may think proper.

Even that authority was contested, I think, by Massachusetts as to the President's right to use the militia away from the borders of their own States; yet we are going here in this matter to give all the power which is necessary for the President of the United States to declare war himself without the consent of Congress.

Mr. President, it does seem to me that, without regard to party, we ought on both sides of the Chamber to pause. We all have responsibility to our constituents and to the whole people. We know that depression exists from one end of the land to the other. We know that depression exists not only in our own country, but abroad. The great question to be solved—and it will be solved, in my judgment, by the sturdy men in charge of the business enterprises of the world, and not by legislation—is how we can set the wheels again in motion, how we can restore prosperity? There is one thing we can do. We can limit in Congress the expenses within reasonable bounds. If we can not increase the revenue at this session, and it is still to be made a party football, we can at least eliminate from these bills all the appropriations which are not necessary. They are there by the hundreds. Here you can save on this bill alone, without injury to a single interest, without crippling the Navy, within the next three years, $15,000,000. The Secretary of the Treasury has told us, "You appropriate the money and I must spend it."

I repeat, Mr. President, that he who votes for these extravagant appropriations must do it with full knowledge that he takes his responsibility for the further issue of bonds or for the expenditure of every dollar which has come from those already sold.

A year ago the Committee on Appropriations, foreseeing that the then appropriations as compared with the revenue were such that there would be a deficit in the Treasury, reported to this body a proposition authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue short-term certificates bearing 3 per cent interest, redeemable at any time after two or three years. That was antagonized. What was the result? Four per cent bonds running for a longer term of years were issued instead of those short-term certificates. I remember the Senator from Mississippi to my left [Mr. GEORGE], in the discussion of that matter, asked the question of the chairman of the Committee on Finance whether the report from the Treasury Department showed that they had money enough on hand and a surplus, and he was answered, "Yes." That was the estimate at the time, but it was short, and it will be short now. I say to the Senate that if the amendment I have offered is voted down, and if, by a majority vote, they increase or keep these appropriations as they are, then there is one thing that the other side ought to agree to do, put a permanent provision in this bill, as the Secretary of the Treasury has recommended, authorizing the issuance of $50,000,000 of these short-term certificates at a low rate of interest, to be issued and used by him to pay the current expenses of the Government rather than to issue more bonds. Before this bill shall have been concluded I propose to offer such an amendment, and I say to the Senate that, in my judgment, we must do that or else by your votes you must sustain the action which has been taken heretofore by the Executive in selling long-term bonds whenever he finds the Treasury depleted.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, the controversy here to-day with regard to the revenues of the Government does not appear to be sincere. There appears to be an assumption that we want more money in the Treasury, when the Treasury is already overflowing. It matters not how the surplus was acquired, there is a surplus in the Treasury, and a surplus has been regarded during the whole history of the Government as more dangerous than a deficiency.

There is now in the Treasury at least $270,000,000 of available cash—available to pay current expenses, available to pay interest, and available for the redemption of Treasury notes and greenbacks. There is certainly over $150,000,000 more in the Treasury than there ought to be. There has been withdrawn from circulation by the sale of bonds more than $270,000,000, and we ought at least to draw out from the Treasury as speedily as possible $150,000,000. The vast amount of money piled there is having a most disastrous effect upon the country.

The pretext that anybody has been compelled to sell bonds is also an assumption which I deny. There has been no necessity to sell bonds. There has been no right on the part of the Executive to sell bonds; there has been no law under which bonds could be legally disposed of to buy money. It was settled by a more than two-thirds vote of both Houses of Congress in 1873, after an exhaustive debate, that every obligation of the Government was payable in either gold or silver coin at the option of the United States, and that it was legal and proper to coin silver dollars for the payment of all the obligations of the Government.

The only pretext of authority to involve this country in debt is based upon the idea that the Government owes gold obligations. By the resumption act of 1875 it is provided that after the Secretary of the Treasury has exhausted the current revenues he may sell bonds of the descriptions named in the act of July 14, 1870, sufficient to obtain coin with which to redeem greenbacks which would be outstanding on the 1st day of January, 1879. To an extent necessary to redeem the greenbacks then outstanding he might sell bonds to buy coin; and it was held by both Houses of Congress that silver coin answered that description; and it never has been successfully questioned. The present Secretary of the Treasury when in Congress voted for that resolution, and all the leading members of both Houses, including the most prominent candidate for the Presidency, Mr. McKinley, of Ohio, voted for that resolution, and it was presumed that the question was settled.

Then the Secretary of the Treasury was authorized to sell bonds to buy coin sufficient to redeem United States Treasury notes and for no other purpose. Is there authority for it elsewhere? There is none. By the act of 1890, commonly called the Sherman Act, it is provided that the Treasury notes issued under that act shall be redeemed in either gold or silver coin at the option of the Secretary of the Treasury; and it is further made mandatory upon the Secretary, by the third section of that act, to coin sufficient of the bullion purchased under the act to provide for the redemption of the notes. The act expressly provided for coining silver to redeem the Treasury notes issued under the act. If there was not sufficient coin in the Treasury for the purpose of such redemption, the provision of law providing for the coining of silver for that purpose excluded, by implication, any other mode of obtaining coin for the redemption of the notes. That provision, making it mandatory upon the Secretary of the Treasury to coin silver to provide for the redemption of those notes, was equivalent to a positive law that he should not obtain money in any other way unless Congress provided it; that he should not invent any other mode, but should take the mode provided by law; and in selling bonds to buy gold to redeem the Treasury notes issued under the Sherman Act the Secretary of the Treasury violated the plainest principles of law.

The Administration is now, without a shadow of law, selling bonds to buy gold to pay the current expenses of the Government, for, view it as you will, that is the only pretext. The suggestion on his part that he sells the bonds to buy gold to maintain the gold standard is an admission of a usurpation, and there is no law authorizing it. There is no law authorizing him to sell bonds to buy gold for any purpose, and there never was. I defy any lawyer or any man in the United States to point to a shadow of law that authorizes the President of the United States or the Administration to sell bonds to buy gold for any purpose.

The Administration, in violation of the law, in violation of the express duties prescribed by the statute, has involved the country in two hundred and sixty-odd million dollars of debt, and has accumulated $270,000,000 of available cash balance in the Treasury.

The argument is that the current revenues are not sufficient. That makes no difference; the money is there. It is an injury to the country that it should be there. It contracts the currency and makes times worse. It is a temptation to make appropriations and to indulge in extravagance. It being there, I am opposed to putting money there by any other means.

The idea of parties on both sides of the Chamber in pretending that there is necessity for more taxation upon a people already taxed beyond endurance to accumulate a larger surplus in the Treasury is an absurdity. A few years ago, when there was less surplus than now, there was a general clamor throughout the country to reduce taxation to get rid of the surplus. Taxation was reduced, the surplus was disposed of, but the Executive has accumulated a surplus greater than the former by bald usurpation.

Do Senators ever reflect what raising revenue by the Executive without the authority of Congress means? If the Executive can raise money to carry on the Government without calling on Congress this is no longer a Republic. Do Senators remember the controversy that occurred some three hundred years ago, when Charles I undertook to raise revenue to carry on his Government without the consent of Parliament? He lost his head. The exercise of the power to raise revenue without authority of Parliament was the principal cause of the English revolution. The same exercise of power is going on here. Neither party will attempt to check it. It is impossible to get through a resolution against it. We have been struggling for years to stop this proceeding, but it can not be done. We can not even have a resolution to examine the transactions with regard to selling bonds that have already occurred. Both parties are in favor of selling bonds in some form. It has been proposed on both sides of the Chamber to continue to involve this country in more debt to buy gold for gold gamblers.

The reason why you have not revenue enough under existing law is because the country is doing no business. There is no money with which to do business. Business is stagnant; the country is languishing. You have by your gold standard and by your sale of bonds created a surplus revenue. You have by every means curtailed the circulating medium until business is at a standstill.

The wealth of this country consists in its power of production more than in the property already produced. The productive forces of this country reproduce all the wealth in a very short period. For the last three years there has not been 83 per cent of the power of production realized in this country for the want of a circulating medium. While you stifle production, while you have millions of tramps, while you have poverty everywhere, while you are filling your insane asylums, while you are multiplying your suicides, while you are flooding the country with bankrupts, while you strangle enterprise for want of money, you can not expect revenue under any bill. The more taxation you have the less revenue you will get under it.

If the revenue laws had been enforced; if all the laws had been obeyed by the Secretary of the Treasury; if the Secretary of the Treasury had coined silver and paid it out as required by law, we would not have lost our gold. If when Secretary Foster was asked after the passage of the Sherman Act whether he would obey the law and coin silver to redeem Treasury notes he had answered that he would, and that he would make no discrimination between gold and silver, do you suppose there would have been any run upon the Treasury? Do you suppose there would have been a word said? Do you suppose the combination to put Austria on a gold basis would have been made? Do you suppose that they would have attempted that combination or would have attempted to put Austria on a gold basis if it had not been for the assurances that they could get the gold here?

Do you remember that after the dinner at Delmonico's on the 17th of November, 1891, wherein Secretary Foster pledged this Government to pay gold, and said that he would not coin silver for the purpose of redeeming the Treasury notes issued under the Sherman Act, the President, in his annual message, declared that such assurance had done much to sustain the business interests? Do you recollect that in January following the Austrian cabinet met and agreed to the Rothschilds proposition to fund the debt of Austria? Do you recollect that they waited until both Presidential nominations were made, and immediately thereafter they took a million dollars of Treasury notes under the Sherman Act to the subtreasury at New York, demanded gold, got it, and they also obtained an interview with that officer declaring that that was the policy of the Government? Do you mark that immediately thereafter, in August, the legislative department of Austria met and sanctioned the proceeding to fund the debt? Do you recollect that they commenced then to sell Austrian gold bonds in Europe and elsewhere, and to get gold for the purchase of Austrian bonds they sold their American securities in this country for gold to accumulate $150,000,000 of gold as a basis of redemption for the Austrian debt? Do you recollect that before Harrison's Administration closed they had drawn the gold reserve down to the hundred-million-dollar limit? Do you recollect that Secretary Carlisle is reported to have issued an order to pay in silver, and the next morning it was overruled by the President, and this Austrian combination had free access to our Treasury? Do you recollect the panic that followed the draining of the gold for gold gamblers?

Mr. GEORGE. I did not catch what the Senator said about Secretary Carlisle doing something and the next morning something else was done.

Mr. STEWART. It is reported that he issued an order to redeem the Treasury notes in silver. I know the President came out with a proclamation the next morning declaring that they would be paid in gold. I do not know whether it is denied or not. I think probably Secretary Carlisle did that.

Then what occurred? The Austrian debt was funded, and it was raised from a two-billion-four-hundred-million-dollar debt payable in silver to a two-billion-eight-hundred-million-dollar debt payable in gold. Two hundred million dollars of that may have been used for commissions and to buy $150,000,000 of gold, for the bonds were sold for from 92 to 96. Suppose it took $200,000,000 to pay commissions and buy their $150,000,000 of gold. Who got the other $200,000,000 of the $400,000,000? Where did it go? What officials were influenced by it?

One thing we do know, and that is, it took our gold and brought on the panic. It stopped business. That raid injured this country. It cost this country more than double the cost of the war. It destroyed thousands of millions of securities in this country. It threw millions of people out of employment. It paralyzed industry everywhere. Then, to add a climax to the miseries of the people, the President of the United States called an extra session of Congress and wiped from the statute books by the votes of the two Houses which the Executive controlled every law that recognized silver as money and reduced this country to the single gold standard.

Now we are told that the misery in this country comes from our protests against the gold standard. They tell us that we would have happiness but for the talk about free silver, that our talk is doing all the harm. You might as well say that the only thing that made the wolf eat the lamb was because the lamb struggled. The Treasury was robbed of millions of gold for gold gamblers and stockjobbers without law, and the country was deprived of a circulating medium, and universal distress was created, as an object lesson to show the power of the Executive and the power of money. We have felt it and we will continue to feel it. But the American people now begin to understand what the matter is. There is not a business man in this country who, if you ask him why he is in trouble, will not tell you, for want of money.

If you ask him why he does not get money, he will tell you that his property will not bring money.

Go where you please, you will find that the agriculturists of this country are living more economically and in fact are suffering more for the necessities of life than they ever did at any time since the landing at Jamestown. Never before was every opportunity to young men to make headway in the world closed. Never before was the prospect for the youth of this land so dark. Never before was poverty staring the whole mass of the people in the face. Never before were willing hands denied the privilege of working in this country. The circulating medium is gone; the population is increasing and money is decreasing. There is $100,000,000 less money in the country to-day than there was a year ago, and still it is said that we want more contraction! We have the proposition now coming from Democrats and Republicans to retire the greenbacks, to get rid of the Treasury notes. What for? More contraction. What for? To give money more purchasing power. What for? To allow the few to enslave the many.

That is the situation, and when Senators talk about more taxation upon the people already groaning under taxation, when they talk about more revenue with a Treasury overloaded with surplus, they mock the American people. We need no more taxation. We need an opportunity to pay taxes. Just see how we are situated. It is estimated that the debts of the United States, public and private, amount to the vast sum of thirty thousand million dollars. How do we pay those debts? They are paid with the product of labor. Many of them were contracted when wheat was $1.25 a bushel and cotton 12 cents a pound. Now, see how the debts have increased. These are fixed charges. The interest on these obligations is a fixed charge. The salaries of officials remain the same; they are fixed charges. We have to pay $500,000,000 for the support of the General Government, and not less than $1,500,000,000 for State and local taxes to support schools and churches and to pay the local taxes of the country. It does not amount to less than $1,500,000,000. This, together with the other fixed charges, rest upon the people, and it takes twice as many bushels of wheat, twice as many pounds of cotton, twice as much of the products of labor to earn a dollar now as it did twenty years ago, and the amount required is daily increasing. Taxes are increasing. They have driven the farmers from their homes; they are driving the laborers from their homes; they are depriving them of the means of educating their children. For what? Talk about economy. The President tells us that they must remember that they buy as well as they sell. To what do their purchases amount? It is very little after they pay their fixed charges. They must sell, however, and they are left without the necessities of life. That is the condition.

Give the people more money. Give them an opportunity to make a living and a liberal opportunity to pay taxes. Stop your forced sale of taxes and you will have revenue enough. But with the present depressed condition of the country, to extract more revenue by increased taxation is murder; it is outrage. I protest against the idea of an overflowing Treasury with a depressed people taxed beyond endurance and any discussion here of more taxation. I say give the people more money. Give them a chance to pay the taxes already levied. The increased business of the country will give you ample revenue. But in the present condition of the country, in its present stagnation, you may pile up taxation as you please; you are increasing the burdens every year without increasing the revenue.

Our fixed charges to Europe amount to at least $400,000,000 a year. A year ago we paid about $100,000,000 of that. Last year we did not pay a cent. I speak of our fixed charges to Europe, and I give them a most conservative estimate. That is the carrying trade, the travel abroad, the interest and dividends, which amount now to $400,000,000. Not one cent of it was paid last year. We are giving our public and private notes or bonds, and what for? To buy gold for gold gamblers. We are giving our notes to Great Britain for gold with which to buy her commodities and with which to pay her the interest which she demands of us.

Can this Government go on always increasing its obligations to Europe, selling its products below the cost of production to buy gold to pay this accumulating interest? It seems to me there should be some thought of relieving the people, and I protest, while distress is universal, against any discussion which leads to more bonds or more taxation. We have enough of those.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. President, at some time I expect to take a part in this discussion, but for the present I shall ask the Secretary to read the slip I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested. The Secretary read as follows:

CONTRACTION BY FREE SILVER.

The most effective plea the 16 to 1 free-silver men address to ignorance and poverty is that we have not money enough. They urge that for this reason the prices of products have fallen, until the farmer is embarrassed to get means with which to support his family. They urge free coinage as a means of giving the people "more money."

And yet there was never proposed so great or so disastrous a measure of currency contraction as free coinage would be. The facts are simple and easily understood.

There is no country in the world at this moment that uses both gold and silver or their paper representatives as money which does not maintain the gold standard and restrict the coinage of silver. There is no country in which free silver coinage exists that does not use silver to the exclusion of gold. In brief, it is a fact open to observation that free silver coinage at present ratios always and everywhere drives all money except silver and silver-bearing paper out of use.

Now, we have at present a total volume of money amounting to $2,197,000,000. Of this there are—

Gold coin.....	$548,104,930
Gold certificates.....	50,000,889
Greenbacks.....	345,712,504
National-bank notes.....	213,716,973
Total gold money.....	1,077,626,296

All this is gold or gold-bearing paper, the national-bank notes being so indirectly but effectively. Unlimited free silver coinage at 16 to 1 would immediately send all this currency out of circulation. It would contract the currency of the country by more than a billion dollars. Instead of giving us more money it would reduce the total stock by about one-half and depress prices accordingly.

Or if the paper currency were retained on a silver basis by a Treasury decision to redeem greenbacks in silver, there would still be a contraction of more than $600,000,000, or considerably more than one-fourth of the total currency supply.

If we are really suffering from an inadequate currency, the insane thing we could do would seem to be to compel a further and enormous contraction by adopting free silver coinage.

Mr. STEWART. That has gone the rounds sufficiently without publishing it here. It shows the sublime confidence of the author in the ignorance of the American people. It says if we would add silver to gold it would contract the currency.

Mr. PEPPER. Will the Senator permit me before he proceeds?

Mr. STEWART. No; I want to say a word in reply.

Mr. PEPPER. I should like to inquire whether the printed matter which has just been read by the Secretary represents the views of the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. PALMER. I have no desire to interrupt the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. STEWART. I understand where it comes from. It comes from the Reform Club of New York; it is the "sound view" of all those people.

Mr. PEPPER. I merely wanted to know whether it represents the views of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. STEWART. It comes from the holy of holies of the gold standard.

Mr. PALMER. If the Senator from Kansas will allow me, I will state that within a day or two I hope to have an opportunity to address the Senate on this subject at length, but I have no desire to interrupt the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. STEWART. I will be through in a moment.

In the first place, it says that doubling the coinage, doubling the base of the circulation, would decrease its volume.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. President—

Mr. STEWART. I hope the Senator will not interrupt me.

Mr. PALMER. I was going to ask whether that is the statement.

Mr. STEWART. That is the substance.

Mr. PALMER. The statement?

Mr. STEWART. Oh, yes; I will tell you what the statement is.

I state as an incontrovertible fact that the amount of standard money controls the volume. There must be some relation between the credit and circulation and the amount of standard money. We have no standard money in the country but gold. The Treasury has no gold except what it borrows from time to time. They exaggerate the amount of gold in the country. There is probably $350,000,000 of gold in the country, not over $400,000,000 at the outside, and if I had time I could go on and show why. That is all we have. All our circulation is based upon that, and consequently everybody knows that the foundation is insufficient. There can be no confidence. There is no confidence in the country. No credit can be extended, because there is no foundation for our credit. Gold can be taken out at any time. We are depending upon borrowing it and increasing the national debt. It is the only way we have to get gold. We have no other means of getting it except by increasing the debt. Our products which we sell abroad have become entirely inadequate to buy gold. We have no foundation for our currency, and to say that coining silver, giving a foundation for this credit, remonetizing the silver in the Treasury, would make less money is ridiculous. We have a large amount of silver in the Treasury. If it were money we would have some basis. But the Department says it is not money with which to pay debts. It is of no more use than so much pig iron. They will not pay it out for the obligations of the Government. It amounts to nothing so far as a basis of circulation is concerned.

The Department boldly say that silver itself must be redeemed in gold, and they keep it at a parity by their determination to redeem it in gold. The whole thing rests upon this narrow basis of gold. Except the small amount in circulation, besides the fractional silver, the balance is idle in the Treasury. It has to be bolstered up by borrowing gold. See how the currency stands with your greenbacks, your Treasury notes, your bank circulation, and all your silver depending upon redemption in gold as the Administration says. Then think of the little fleeting gold that you buy to maintain all that. That is what destroys confidence. That is what makes business men so anxious to borrow gold and issue bonds to get some money in the Treasury to bolster up what you have. There is no foundation for confidence. The remonetization of silver and the use of silver as money would give us a basis strong enough to maintain double the credit and double the circulation we have.

The gold men say it would drive gold out of the country. Was gold driven out of the country by the Bland Act or the Sherman Act? Did it not accumulate constantly while silver was used even under the limited commercial way of purchasing it and coining it? But let the Government of the United States say that silver is as good as gold and that it would just as soon have it as gold, and you would have something with which to buy gold. How does gold come into the country? Does it fly in? Does it come here by a kite? It is bought and brought here by our products. But the gold standard has reduced the value of our products below the cost of production, and with all we can export we can not pay for what other commodities we buy. Consequently we get no gold. Give us prosperity, set the wheels of industry in motion, and you can buy gold with your exports. But while silver is at the present price, while the Asiatics have a hundred per cent advantage in difference of exchange, they can furnish the wheat and cotton and take our markets from us.

Look at Russia. She is on a silver basis. She has grown rich in the last twenty years while we have grown poor. Twenty years ago our bonds were worth much more than Russia's bonds. Now her bonds are as good as ours, and she has some five or six hundred millions of gold which she does not use for circulation, because her ruble is the unit and she puts out paper enough to keep it on a par with the silver ruble. The consequence is she can produce wheat and drive us out of the market, as she has done.

The farmer of Russia takes his bushel of wheat to London. He sells it for the same price that we do. He goes back to his country and his money is doubled. He has fixed charges to pay the same as we do, but he can pay his fixed charges with half the labor and with half the products that we can. Our fixed charges have to be paid in gold. A bushel of wheat is taken to Liverpool. It is sold for 60 cents. It is 60 cents when it gets here. A bushel of wheat is taken from Russia to Liverpool. It is sold for 60 cents, and it is $1.20 when it gets home to pay fixed charges with. The burdens are thrown off the backs of the people and they prosper; they can produce more wheat and they have driven us out of the market. The same is true of the Asiatics. Our farmers are brought face to face with this ruinous competition. Of course we can not have gold here. It is our poverty that makes them take the gold from us, because we must sell at gold prices in competition with the Asiatics. We can not accumulate it unless we have something with which to buy gold. When a man says that the remonetization of silver would produce contraction, he thinks the people of the United States are very ignorant or he is ignorant or vicious.

When did the coinage of silver in this country drive out gold? The two metals have been side by side for a thousand years, and it was easier to get gold while silver and gold could both be used. But when we are confined to gold alone and nothing to buy it with, the gold hoarded in Europe for military purposes, or held in a pool by the Rothschilds, it is different. We are selling our products to the Rothschilds combination to buy their gold. They have a gold corner, and they say to us, "You shall come to us and borrow gold to pay your interest"; yet it is said more standard coin would be contraction. When they talk about $2,000,000,000 in circulation they duplicate the figures. There is no such amount in the country. They duplicate the figures to the extent of more than $500,000,000. For instance, silver certificates are counted and the silver in the Treasury is counted; the gold certificates are counted and the gold in the Treasury is counted, and so it goes through. The most fallacious statement ever uttered by man is uttered in the paper presented by the Senator from Illinois. All the genius of duplicity, all the essence of avarice, all the desire to humbug and to deceive are concentrated in those few words. It is a result of years of juggling of words by the conspirators who demonetized silver to double the value of their obligations and to enslave the people. The idea that the American people must be loaded down with these accumulated debts and have the money with which to pay them taken away is preposterous.

If my friend the Senator from Illinois will go to his State he will find the farmers there struggling to pay taxes, to pay interest, to school their children, and he will find that they sell wheat and what they raise at less than the cost of production. There is nothing left for them. If he does not know it, the country knows it. If he does not know that there is suffering in the country, the country does. The idea of trying to conceal from the people that there is universal distress! Where has it been produced? Nowhere but in the Halls of Congress. Why should there be universal distress after twenty years of abundant harvests and profound peace? What has occurred to make times worse than they ever were? What has occurred to take away from young men the opportunity to acquire wealth by industry? What has occurred to bring gloom to the country and sadness to every household? What has occurred to multiply suicides, to increase the millions of tramps? What has occurred to make hard times? Is there anything but the financial legislation of this country? What else can be pointed to?

You have tried all sorts of tariffs. You have tried a Republican tariff. You have tried the McKinley Act. After it was in force for two years you had the worst panic that has ever been witnessed in this country. The McKinley law remained in force a year after, and it did not cure the panic. It was a disease beyond the power of protection. It was a disease too deep to be cured by such a measure. I have advocated protection all my life, but it can not cure the currency disease. It is inadequate, it is impotent.

You have the Wilson Act. What has it done? It has not made a ripple. For the last three years, since Secretary Foster declared that he would not obey the law and coin silver to pay the obligations of the country, since it was determined that silver should be absolutely disgraced and not used as money, we have been on the downward course. Each succeeding year has been worse than the preceding, and now the only hope of the Republican party to get in power is that the Democratic party has made the condition intolerable. They think that the people have forgotten that the former Administration made it so intolerable that they elected Cleveland.

Look how this thing has gone on. In 1884 the Republican party was so intolerable that the people elected Cleveland. In 1888 the Democratic party was so intolerable that they elected Harrison. In 1892 the Republican party was so intolerable that they forgot the shortcomings of Cleveland and returned to him, and now it is supposed that a sufficient amount of political capital has been accumulated from the present Administration to make the people go on and step out of the frying pan into the fire. So they go, jumping from the frying pan into the fire, and then into the roaster. Each party runs on the misdoings of the other, and the "outs" have an unlimited capital in the misdeeds of the "ins." That is what the Republican party relies on. They rely on the short memory of the people. They think they have an unlimited capital in the infamy of the present Administration. In four years they will accumulate capital enough for another change. They think the people of the United States are sufficiently ignorant to be hoodooed and fooled right along. And what do we have to-day? A serious discussion about increasing the surplus in the Treasury when the country is already overloaded with taxation. Neither party intends to give relief. Both intend to deceive the people and augment the wealth and power of gold monopoly, which is the mother of all monopolies.

Mr. CALL. I offer two amendments to the pending bill which I ask may be printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

- A bill (H. R. 2359) for the relief of William B. Ellis;
- A bill (H. R. 4921) to relieve the North Georgia Agricultural College from the payment of $450 for damaged gun; and
- A bill (H. R. 8037) for the relief of John McLain, alias Michael McLain.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs:

- A bill (H. R. 4324) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to deliver one condemned cannon to the city of Elmwood, Peoria County, Ill.; and
- A bill (H. R. 6356) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Navy to furnish to George F. Fuller Post, Grand Army of the Republic, of Manistique, Mich., a condemned cannon.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Finance:

- A bill (H. R. 953) for the relief of William Gray; and
- A bill (H. R. 6836) to amend section 2981 of the Revised Statutes as amended by the act of June 10, 1880.

MARRIAGES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1904) to regulate marriages in the District of Columbia.

Mr. FAULKNER. I move that the Senate nonconcur in the amendments of the House of Representatives and request a conference with the House on the bill and amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Vice-President was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. FAULKNER, Mr. McMILLAN, and Mr. GALLINGER were appointed.

CAPITAL RAILWAY COMPANY.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 688) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Capital Railway Company," approved March 2, 1895.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate nonconcur in the amendments of the House of Representatives and ask a conference with the House on the bill and amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Vice-President was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. McMILLAN, Mr. FAULKNER, and Mr. PROCTOR were appointed.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7664) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and agree to the conference asked by the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Vice-President was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. ALLISON, Mr. HALE, and Mr. GORMAN were appointed.

POTOMAC RIVER FLATS.

Mr. TELLER. I desire to have an order for reprinting Senate Document 151, being a report of the findings of the supreme court of the District of Columbia in the matter of the right, title, or interest of any person or corporation adverse to the complete and paramount right of the United States in the Potomac River Flats, with the accompanying papers. I wish to state that the document is to be printed for the use of the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations on the District appropriation bill. There are quite a number of maps, and I desire that the first copies shall be sent to the Senate without the maps, and that subsequently the maps be put in. I wish to have an order made to make the printing special.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7542) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] to the amendment of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN].

Mr. SQUIRE. If there are no Senators who desire to discuss the bill further to-night, I would ask the Senate to take up some unobjected bills on the Calendar.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from California, I think, desires to submit some remarks on the pending bill, and perhaps also the Senator from Connecticut. Neither of them, however, is ready or inclined to go on to-night, and if there are other matters upon the Calendar that Senators desire to have taken up between now and 6 o'clock—

Mr. GORMAN. Oh, no; let us adjourn.

Mr. HILL. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. HALE. I hope the Senator from New York will withdraw his motion—

Mr. PLATT. Will the Senator from New York withdraw his motion for a moment?

Mr. HALE. Otherwise I would—

Mr. PLATT. I should like to make a statement to the Senate.

Mr. HILL. The motion is withdrawn for the purpose of the statement.

Mr. PLATT. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR], who is very much interested in the subject of coast defenses, and who has been obliged to leave the city, prepared a speech before leaving which, if here, he would deliver upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN], and in support of the amendment, as I understand it. He left it with me and requested me to ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that it might be printed in the RECORD, or, if that should be refused, to read it for him myself. If unanimous consent can not be granted,

I will accommodate the Senator from Vermont by reading his speech.

Mr. HALE. Let the Senator from Connecticut submit the request now that the speech of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR] on the pending amendment be printed in to-morrow morning's RECORD.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. BACON. I object.

Mr. HAWLEY. I should like to ask a question first. I think that is a very dangerous precedent.

Mr. PLATT. If there is objection I will withdraw the request.

Mr. HAWLEY. I want to suggest a way out of it. I think there would be no objection to having the Secretary read it.

Mr. GRAY. The Senator's colleague [Mr. PLATT] can read it.

Mr. HAWLEY. My colleague can begin it, and ask permission of the Senate for the Secretary to finish it.

Mr. HALE. Then I suggest that we go on and consume the time until 6 o'clock, and that the Secretary commence reading the speech of the Senator from Vermont, if the Senator from Connecticut has it in his hand and will send it to the desk.

Mr. BACON. I hope not.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. HILL. What is the request?

Mr. HALE. That the Secretary may be permitted to read the speech of the Senator from Vermont, who is necessarily absent, and who desires that his speech be incorporated into the debate on the pending amendment. The suggestion is now that the Secretary shall begin—

Mr. PLATT. I will go ahead now.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Connecticut will go on himself.

Mr. HILL. The only question is whose speech it is.

Mr. HALE. It is the speech of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR].

Mr. HILL. Is that not establishing a bad precedent, even for the Senate?

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Connecticut can make it as his own speech.

Mr. HILL. He can do that. A Senator can always make a speech. He is competent to do that. But the question is whether we want to start the custom of a Senator making another Senator's speech here and having it printed in the RECORD. I do not think it is a good practice. I shall have to object, Mr. President.

Mr. FAULKNER. I understand the Senator from Connecticut has withdrawn that request, and he is now about to make the speech himself.

Mr. HALE and Mr. GRAY. And in his own time.

Mr. FAULKNER. The Senator from Connecticut has withdrawn the request he first made.

Mr. HALE. Both requests have been withdrawn—the request to print in the RECORD and the request to have the Secretary read the speech. I understand the Senator from Connecticut proposes to go on and read the speech in his own time.

Mr. HILL. I have no objection to the Senator from Connecticut making his speech, but I must object to his making the speech of somebody else, and having it appear in the RECORD that it is the speech of somebody else.

Several SENATORS. He has the right to do that.

Mr. HILL. No; he has not the right to do that. It is a practice that is abused in the other House, and it is unworthy of the Senate, and ought not to be made a precedent. With all due respect to the Senator from Vermont, who is absent, I think it is a precedent that ought not to be established, and I want to object right here. The Senator can make his own speech, and the RECORD will show that it is his speech. That is the right practice, and we must adhere to it.

Mr. FAULKNER. Let me suggest to the Senator from New York that if the Senator from Connecticut chooses to make a few preliminary remarks, and then proceeds to read the speech prepared by the Senator from Vermont, I do not know any ground in the world on which you can stop it, or any rule or custom of the Senate under which you could prevent it.

Mr. HILL. That is not the point.

Mr. FAULKNER. That is what the Senator from Connecticut proposes to do.

Mr. HILL. He can read the speech of Daniel Webster as part of his remarks, or read his own speech made years ago, or anybody else's speech; but that is not the point. That, however, is all he can do. Do not let us begin such a practice now out of courtesy to the absent Senator from Vermont. It strikes me it would be a bad precedent for the future. Let each Senator make his own speech, and let the whole of it be printed in the RECORD as his speech. That is what the Senate has always adhered to, and it is a good practice. If the Senator from Connecticut wants to go on now—it is rather a late hour for a speech from anybody, at half past 5 o'clock in the afternoon, after the able discussion by different Senators to which we have listened upon the bond question, and so on. [Laughter.]

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that the request of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] has been withdrawn. The pending question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] to the amendment of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN].

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President—

Mr. HILL. I have the floor. I yielded to the Senator from Connecticut to make a statement. I move now that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. HALE. I hope we shall remain here until 6 o'clock.

Several SENATORS. No, no.

Mr. GORMAN. Let us adjourn.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New York that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 33 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, April 29, 1896, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, April 28, 1896.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

PENSIONS.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule adopted by the House, the first business this morning after the reading of the Journal is the vote upon the passage of House bill No. 8271, relating to pensions.

Mr. CROWTHER. On that question I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 189, nays 54, not voting 111; as follows:

CHARLES K. JENREE.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 6298) to correct the military record of Charles K. Jenree, etc.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, subject to objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc. That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Charles K. Jenree, late of Company B, Twenty-seventh New York Volunteer Infantry, and to issue to the said Charles K. Jenree an honorable discharge: Provided, That no pay, bounty, or emoluments shall become due by virtue of the passage of this act.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the reading of the report in that case, subject to the right of objection.

The report (by Mr. FENTON) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6298) for the relief of Charles K. Jenree, having had the same under consideration, report it back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The facts in the case, as shown by the papers and documents submitted to the committee, are as follows:

Charles K. Jenree enlisted as a private in Company B, Twenty-seventh New York Volunteer Infantry, July 5, 1861, for a period of two years, and was honorably discharged by reason of expiration of term of enlistment May 31, 1863.

He reenlisted August 8, 1863, in Company D, First Veteran Volunteer New York Cavalry, for three years, and served faithfully up to February 1, 1865.

On the 17th of January, 1865, Jenree received a fifteen days' furlough, on account of sickness in his family, and on reaching home found his wife at the point of death with consumption, and he decided to remain with her until her death, which took place in July, 1865. Jenree says he thought the duty he owed to his sick and dying wife was paramount to every other consideration, and so he did not return to his command, and was marked as a deserter from the time of the expiration of his furlough. By this act he lost six months' pay as well as his bounty.

His record as a soldier was exceptionally good, and shows him to have been both brave and honorable and faithful and prompt in the discharge of every duty.

At the battle of Piedmont, Va., June 5, 1864, his colonel's horse was disabled, and Jenree promptly dismounted and gave Colonel Carter his own horse.

Col. John J. Carter, commanding Jenree's regiment, pays him a high compliment and gives him (Jenree) an excellent record as a soldier.

Jenree is now an old man, reduced to such extreme poverty and helplessness as necessitates his being an inmate of the poorhouse; his wife and children are dead, and he seems to have no one to care for him. It is a sad finale to an active career and an honorable life to have added to his other troubles the cloud that has hung over him during the last thirty years—that of being untrue to his country—which, from his standpoint, was rendered necessary by the higher duty he owed to his dying wife.

In view of all the circumstances the committee think that it would be a generous act to let a single ray of sunshine fall upon the closing hours of this old man's life, so full of startling vicissitudes, by the prompt passage of the pending bill.

There being no objection, the bill was considered, and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE COLUMBIA RIVER.

Mr. HERMANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1176) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the Oregon and Washington Bridge Company to construct and maintain a bridge across the Columbia River between the State of Oregon and the State of Washington, and to establish it as a post-road."

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc. That "An act to authorize the Oregon and Washington Bridge Company to construct and maintain a bridge across the Columbia River, between the State of Oregon and the State of Washington, and to establish it as a post road," approved March 24, 1890, be, and the same is hereby, extended, revived, and declared to be in full force and effect from and after March 24, 1892. Section 12 of said act, which provides that said act shall be null and void if actual construction of the bridge therein authorized be not commenced within two years and completed within four years from the date of the approval thereof, shall be, and the same is hereby, so amended that the time within which said bridge is required to be commenced shall be within two years from June 24, 1895, and the time within which it is required that said bridge be completed shall be within four years from the 24th day of June, 1895.

There being no objection, the bill was considered, and ordered to a third reading; and being read the third time, it was passed.

FORT LEWIS MILITARY RESERVATION, COLO.

Mr. BELL of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 5481) to restore the lands embraced in the Fort Lewis Military Reservation, in the State of Colorado, to the public domain.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc. That the lands included in the Fort Lewis Military Reservation, in Colorado, established by Executive order of date January 27, 1882, and located in townships 34 and 35 north, of ranges 10, 11, and 12 west of the New Mexico principal meridian, are hereby restored to the public domain.

SEC. 2. That said lands shall be subject to occupation, settlement, entry, purchase, and disposal under the public-land laws of the United States, except so much thereof as may be embraced in sections heretofore reserved for school purposes: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to interfere with any rights which may have accrued previous to the withdrawal of said lands for the purposes of such reservation.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Reserving the right to object, I ask for some explanation of this bill.

Mr. BELL of Colorado. Do you desire the report read or some explanation?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Has this the approval of the Secretary of War?

Mr. BELL of Colorado. It is approved by every official interested.

In the first place, let me say to the gentleman that it is unanimously reported from the Committee on the Public Lands. There has been an effort to get this land opened up for two or three sessions of Congress by the Department, and there has been one mistake following another in reference to it. Now the Secretary of the Interior and everybody else interested approves the opening.

This is not a military reservation. It was taken out of the War Department and turned over to the Interior Department a number of years ago.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Does the gentleman state that there is a letter from the Secretary of the Interior approving this action?

Mr. BELL of Colorado. There is a letter stating that they have nothing to say about the manner of opening; but they extract from it the sections that are included in the amendments recommended by the Commissioner of the General Land Office; that is, the amendments propose to exclude certain land for an Indian industrial school and all general school sections. They want these sections for the purpose of an Indian industrial school.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Is this not a military reservation?

Mr. BELL of Colorado. Not now. It was ten or twelve years ago.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Is it not to-day?

Mr. BELL of Colorado. It was turned over by the Secretary of War to the Secretary of the Interior to be used as an industrial school; but there are about 80,000 acres of the land right among the peaks in the mountains. Miners are there now engaged in mining operations. This is right in the very heart of the coal and the gold section, and these men are trying to mine under difficult conditions. There is no objection from any source to the action proposed here.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I would like the letter of the Secretary of the Interior read and placed on record in connection with the matter.

Mr. SHAFROTH. If the gentleman will permit me, this matter was considered by the Public Lands Committee and unanimously reported. It was thoroughly investigated by the committee of which I am a member.

This land is situated about 8,000 or 9,000 feet above the level of the sea. It is not good for any purpose, except probably coal mining and mining of the precious metals, and when it is opened for private entry the Government will get out of it a much greater sum than if it were sold under the abandoned military reservation act. The abandoned military reservation acts require that the land may be advertised and sold at public auction. In that event there would be no appreciable amount received by the United States Government. But if it is opened to settlement then there will be a much greater amount received by the Government. The Secretary of the Interior has sent a letter to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY], chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands, in which he says it is not his province to indicate in what manner the land shall be disposed of, but it ought to be disposed of in some manner.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the gentleman whether this land is to be paid for?

Mr. BELL of Colorado. Oh, yes.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Why, certainly. It can not be had in any other way, except by homestead entry, and there is hardly any of it fit for agricultural purposes.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Then I should like an explanation of the following words in the letter of the Secretary of the Interior:

The facts with reference to said reservation are fully set forth in the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and, as stated by him, the policy of the Government has been, since 1871 to the present time, to require payment for lands in abandoned military reservations.

The question as to whether or not this policy should now be reversed is one which is wholly within the discretion and subject to the determination of Congress.

Now, as I read that, it would imply that if we pass this bill it will be a reversal of the former policy. I want an explanation of that.

Mr. BELL of Colorado. That is explained in the report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I ask to have the report read.

The report (by Mr. SHAFROTH) was read, as follows:

The Committee on the Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6481) to restore the lands embraced in the Fort Lewis Military Reservation, in the State of Colorado, to the public domain, having duly considered the same, do report:

The Fort Lewis Military Reservation was established by Executive order January 27, 1882, embracing 47.4 square miles of the public domain.

On the 12th day of November, 1891, long after said premises had been abandoned for military purposes, the Secretary of War turned all of the buildings, improvements, and premises over to the Secretary of the Interior for industrial-school purposes for educating Indians, and all of the improvements and the lands upon which they are situated and the lands adjacent thereto are now used by the Government for an Indian industrial school, and all such premises and improvements are excluded herefrom, to wit, sections 33, 34, and 35 in township 35 north, range 11 west; sections 9, 10, 11, and 12 in township 34 north, of range 11 west, and what will be, when surveyed, sections Nos. 1, 2, 3, and 4 in township 34 north, of range 11 west.

The foregoing bill was submitted to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and he selected the foregoing premises and informed the committee that the same would be ample for this purpose.

This reservation is near the head waters of the La Plata River, in the mountainous mining district of Colorado, called the San Juan; it is not in an agricultural country, but in the mining region of Colorado, although a very little of this reservation can be tilled and will produce such crops as will mature in an elevation 8,000 feet above sea level. Such tillable land, however, is found in small patches, the most of said reservation being rough mountainous territory only fit for mining, if good for any purpose; that the value of these lands has not been accelerated by contiguous settlement, as is usual in level agricultural countries; that it can not be put up and sold to advantage by the Government; that it is desirable, however, that it be thrown open to settlement under existing laws, that it may be prospected and located by miners if desired; and such as can be cultivated, or that may be found more valuable for other purposes than mining, may be located for such purposes under general land laws.

Therefore the committee recommend that said bill be amended by inserting, after the word "purposes," in the fifth line of the second section, the following: "to wit, sections 33, 34, and 35 in township 35 north of range 11 west; also sections 9, 10, 11, and 12 in township 34 north of range 11 west, and also what will be sections 1, 2, 3, and 4 in township 34 north of range 11 west when surveyed." Also by inserting after the last word of said bill the following: "and excluding all general school sections."

And your committee recommend that the bill as so amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. DINGLEY. I should like to have the gentleman who has this bill in charge explain how this bill will change the general law as applicable to military reservations which have been turned over to the Interior Department. These are mineral lands, are they?

Mr. BELL of Colorado. Yes. It is just as the report says, that you can not sell these lands at public auction for anything. They are located right in the peaks of the mountains.

Mr. DINGLEY. But if they are valuable mineral lands—

Mr. BELL of Colorado. If they are located for coal mining, every man who buys a coal claim must pay $30 an acre. Every man who buys a lode claim pays $5 an acre; and the committee say that the Government will get more money out of it in this way than in any other.

Mr. DINGLEY. That is, the laws applicable to mineral lands will then be applicable to this military reservation?

Mr. BELL of Colorado. Yes; and the committee decided that the Government would get more money out of it in that way than in any other.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BELL of Colorado, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

PETER P. FERGUSON.

Mr. STEWART of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill H. R. 6431.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6431) to pay Peter P. Ferguson $1,705 and interest.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Treasurer of the United States pay to Peter P. Ferguson the sum of $1,705 and interest thereon from December 21, 1892.

The Committee on Claims recommended the adoption of an amendment striking out the words "and interest thereon from December 24, 1892."

Mr. STEWART of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I wish to offer an amendment to the bill which will obviate the objection made the other day by the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I reserve the right to object, after the bill has been explained.

Mr. LOUD. This bill was up for unanimous consent some time ago, and the report was read. It seems to be a perfectly just claim. I objected at that time to the consideration of the bill, because it was not in proper form, as it did not set forth for what purpose the money was to be paid. The gentleman proposes to offer an amendment which will put it in proper shape.

Mr. STEWART of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask that my amendment be reported.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Amend by adding after the word "dollars," in line 5 of printed bill, the following:

"The same being the amount of a certain judgment recovered by the United States against said Ferguson on the 24th day of December, 1892, in the circuit court for the western district of Wisconsin for $1,000, and also $105 expended for costs by said Ferguson in defending the action, and which judgment was paid in full by said Ferguson, it being for the value of timber cut from certain lands in section 5, township 45 north, of range 4 west, Ashland County, Wis., by said Ferguson, and claimed by the United States, and which lands were subsequently determined by the Supreme Court in the case of Wisconsin Central Railroad Company against Forsythe to be owned by the said railroad company, through whom said Ferguson obtained his title."

Amend the title of the bill by striking out the words "with interest."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill as proposed to be amended?

There was no objection.

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The amendment offered by Mr. STEWART of Wisconsin was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DOCKERY. Ought not the title of that bill to be amended?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the title be amended by striking out the words "and interest."

The SPEAKER. Without objection the change will be made.

There was no objection.

On motion of Mr. STEWART of Wisconsin, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

E. R. SHIPLEY.

Mr. TRACEY. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 67) for the relief of E. R. Shipley.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $400 be, and the same hereby is, appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the payment in full to E. R. Shipley for moneys paid, by direction of Post-Office Inspector Edgerton, to parties having money in registered packages stolen from the post-office in Springfield, Mo., on the 23d day of June, 1884.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I ask for the reading of the report.

The report (by Mr. DOWNING) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 67) for the relief of E. R. Shipley, submit the following report:

This bill is the same as House bill 608, now pending in the House and previously reported by this committee with a favorable recommendation. Your committee therefore recommend that this bill be substituted for said House bill, and that said House bill lie on the table.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I ask for the reading of the full report—the report adopted by this committee. There must be a full report stating these facts.

Mr. TRACEY. There was originally a House report, for which this is a substitute. I desire to say, Mr. Speaker, that I can explain the bill so that every gentleman will thoroughly understand it. I explained it to the House when it was up before to the satisfaction of everybody. The facts are that the post-office was entered and a package of registered envelopes taken. The post-office inspector demanded that the money represented by this package of registered envelopes should be paid by the postmaster; and he did pay it, without investigation to see whether he was liable to pay it or not. He simply paid it on the demand of the post-office inspector. The full report gives the statement of the post-office inspector, as well as the statement of all other parties connected with the matter; and there can be no question whatever about the right of the postmaster to recover the money that he thus improperly paid.

Mr. LOUD. You ought to have the report read.

Mr. TRACEY. It was read before. This is a Senate bill reported back by the House committee. They have reported it favorably. The House committee have passed this bill. The full report has all these statements in it, and is an entire statement of the facts.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LOUD. I would like to have read some report, if there is a report, setting forth the facts in the case.

Mr. TRACEY. The House report was read when it was called up before.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report.

The report (by Mr. DOWNING) on the bill H. R. 608 was read, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 608) for the relief of E. R. Shipley, having had the same under consideration, beg leave to report the same with the recommendation that it pass.

The Senate report No. 200, Fifty-third Congress, second session, on this bill fully sets forth the facts, and your committee adopt the same and make it a part of this report.

[Senate Report No. 200, Fifty-third Congress, second session.]

The Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads have considered Senate bill No. 199 and report as follows:

The bill is for the relief of E. R. Shipley, who was postmaster at Springfield, Mo., in June, 1884. On the 23d of June two bundles of registered matter were lost, as it was claimed, in the Springfield office. One of his clerks was charged with stealing the packages and was brought before the United States Commissioner, and, after hearing, discharged. There is nothing to show any guilt or negligence on the part of the postmaster and no suspicion attaches to him, and in the judgment of the committee he is entitled to the relief he asks.

The committee refer to report 113, Fifty-second Congress, first session, made by Mr. Sawyer, chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, where all the facts connected with the matter are stated, and the same is made a part of this report, and recommend the passage of the bill.

[Senate Report No. 113, Fifty-second Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (S. 9) for the relief of E. R. Shipley, have examined the same and report: This bill appropriates $400 to reimburse E. R. Shipley, postmaster of Springfield, Mo., for moneys paid by him to parties whose money in registered packages was stolen. The circumstances are fully detailed in the report made by the House Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, Forty-ninth Congress, first session, which is adopted, and is as follows:

"E. R. Shipley was postmaster of Springfield, Mo., in June, 1884, and for seven years previous to that time. His commission expired October 27, 1885, his successor taking charge of the office January 1, 1886; that during the discharge of the duties of the office of postmaster Mr. Shipley gave close personal attention to all the details and duties of the office. He was careful to select sober, industrious, and competent clerks therein, who observed the rules and regulations governing such offices; that on the 23d day of June, 1884, the postal clerk between Kansas City and Springfield, Mo., claimed to have thrown into his pouch for the Springfield office two bundles of registered matter; that when this pouch reached the Springfield office, on the evening of said day, it was opened by one of the sworn clerks in the office and its contents taken out in the usual and customary way; that one William A. Hoover, a clerk in the office, took charge of the registered matter; said Hoover, on his examination, under charge of stealing said parcel, swore before the United States commissioner that he placed said registered matter in the safe, locking said safe, about 8.45 p. m. on said 23d day of June; that no other person handled the registered matter except said Hoover; that no outsiders were permitted to or did enter the room during this time; that said Hoover, after a full examination was discharged. At 9.15 p. m. of said date Mr. Shipley, the postmaster, unlocked the safe and took out the registers to ascertain if they were in proper shape for dispatch. He then found all the registered matter coming from one train intact, but one bundle of registered matter claimed by the postal clerk on the Kansas City and Springfield road to have been delivered to the office could not be found.

"Mr. Shipley at once entered into a rigid investigation to ascertain by whom said registered package had been taken from the office, if by anyone, but was unable to discover by whom, if by anyone, said package was taken. The package of registers contained 30 packages, consisting of money orders, money, etc., to the amount of $450. But thereafter, on the 21 day of July, 1884, the inspector claimed that another package, containing $10, was lost in said office. Mr. Shipley, upon the demand of the post-office inspector, Gen. Warren P. Edgerton, paid to said inspector the amount of said losses, being in all $460, believing that it was his duty to pay the loss, although he never saw one of the lost parcels and was guilty of no negligence whatever in connection with their loss. Thereafter he made application to the Post-Office Department for reimbursement for the amount so paid; but it was not repaid him by the Department, for the reason that under the facts in this case neither the postmaster at Springfield nor this Government was liable for this loss.

"The committee is of the opinion that the postmaster, in such a case, being guilty of no negligence in the premises, should not have been required to pay said sum of $460, and that the sum should, in justice and equity, be refunded to him.

"The sworn statements of Mr. Shipley, as well as letters of J. J. Hanna, Gen. Warren P. Edgerton, post-office inspector, and Edwin E. Bryant, Assistant Attorney-General of the Post-Office Department, dated the first two May 9, 1885, and the latter January 28, 1886, and also a statement from McLain Jones, United States commissioner, are hereinafter set out in the appendix to this report."

APPENDIX.

Sworn statement of E. R. Shipley, late postmaster.

I, E. R. Shipley, late postmaster at Springfield, Mo., being duly sworn, depose and say that I was postmaster at Springfield, Mo., in June, 1884, and for seven years previous to that time; that my commission expired October 27, 1885, and that my successor took charge of the office January 1, 1886; that in all these eight years I gave close personal attention to all the details and business of the office, performing clerical as well as supervisory work; that my office was in that time inspected or examined by Inspectors Boyd, Baird, Anderson, and Thomas, and that their reports, I verily believe, were creditable to my administration of the office, showing that proper care and protection were given to all matter entrusted to the post-office; that on the 23d of June, 1884, there were employed in the office, as sworn clerks, F. G. Cowan, W. A. Hoover, S. H. Randolph, and F. S. Boutz; that on the 23d day of June, 1884, the postal clerk between Kansas City and Springfield, Mo., claimed to have thrown into his pouch for the Springfield office two bundles of registered matter; that when this pouch reached the Springfield office it was opened by F. G. Cowan, a sworn clerk, and its registered contents, with other matter, thrown or emptied onto a mailing table, as was the usual custom, and that William M. Hoover, a sworn clerk in the office, gathered up the registered matter and carried it into the postmaster's room, laying it on the table, where the record is taken of such matter; that the said Hoover swore before the commissioner that he (Hoover) also took the registered matter from this table and locked it in the safe; that during the time it lay on the postmaster's table no other person handled the registered matter except Mr. Hoover, who only placed it there and removed it therefrom to the safe; that no one entered the room from the time the registers were laid on the table until they were locked in the safe; that from the time the registers were received until after they were locked in the safe there were present in the post-office all the time Messrs. Cowan, Hoover, and Randolph, and a part of the time the postmaster; that at about 8.45 p. m. the registers were locked in the safe (according to sworn statement of Hoover), and that at 9.15 the postmaster came to the office, unlocked the safe, and took out the registers to ascertain if they were in proper shape for dispatch; that he found all the registered matter coming from one train intact; that only one bundle of the registers claimed by postal clerk on Kansas City and Springfield Railroad to have been thrown to the office could be found, and that I (the postmaster) at once sent for Mr. Hoover (the clerk handling the registers), who could give no information as to whether there were more registers put in the safe than I found or not.

Mr. Simpson, the postal clerk, was at once sent for, and he declared that there were two bundles, one of which contained 30 registered packages. The latter could not be found. Hoover swore before the commissioner that he put on the table all he received from the pouch; that he put in the safe all he took from the table, and that he took from the table all that he put there. At no time were all the clerks in the office more than 10 feet away from the table while the registers lay thereon, nor were there any persons other than Hoover in the room where the registers were. The room described is simply a corner of the post-office partitioned off for a postmaster's room, and the door leading thereto is through the office proper and past the employees, so that no one could enter without being seen by employees. I further declare under oath that the manner of handling registered matter is, in my judgment, safe, and that I do not believe anyone entered the office and took the registers therefrom. Further, I declare under oath that my belief has always been that Mr. Simpson, the postal clerk, was in error in claiming that the lost matter was put in the pouch which came into this office. No clerk ever positively saw the lost matter, although after Mr. Simpson positively and emphatically declared there were two bundles, then one of the clerks thought there were two bundles. But to offset this, Mr. Hoover positively swore that all the registers from the pouch were put on the table, and afterwards, so far as he could see, the entire lot were locked in the safe.

I further declare under oath that it was my belief that it was my duty to pay the loss, although I never saw one of the lost parcels; that I wrote to chief inspector that I hoped he would give me a little time to make good the loss, and that he, from time to time, sent me statement of the losses.

I further swear that I sent to General Edgerton, inspector, St. Louis, Mo., August 26, 1884, $100; September 13, 1884, $350; total, $450, to pay the losses above referred to. Also, July 2, 1884, $10, to pay for another letter claimed to have been lost in this office, the theory of the inspectors being that, as Hoover stole the 30 packages, he, having a chance, stole the other; and the case was thus closed by inspectors on this hypothesis. I further swear that it is my belief that not one of these letters was stolen in this office, and that I was not legally or honorably bound to pay the same, but did so on application of the inspectors, recognizing them as superior in authority. I further swear that the receipts of General Edgerton for the above $460 were sent to Hon. William H. Wade, M. C., and that I honestly believe the Government should reimburse me for the same, as suggested by the inspectors who investigated the loss.

I also swear that I have concealed no facts regarding this claim, and stand ready to furnish any additional evidence required.

E. R. SHIPLEY, Late Postmaster.

SPRINGFIELD, Mo., February 3, 1886.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 3d day of February, 1886.
[SEAL.] MCLAIN JONES,
United States Commissioner.

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF POST-OFFICE INSPECTOR,
St. Louis, Mo., May 9, 1885.

DEAR SIR: Upon the request of E. R. Shipley, postmaster at Springfield, Mo., asking for a statement regarding the loss of 30 registers taken from his office in the latter part of June, 1884, I beg leave to submit the following:

I made a full and thorough examination of said loss, and as the result of my investigation arrested one William E. Hoover, a clerk in said office. Hoover was discharged by United States Commissioner Jones upon a preliminary hearing. Prior to my entering upon this investigation Inspector Schourie had fully investigated the case, and reported that Hoover was the guilty party. Notwithstanding the fact that Hoover was discharged by the United States commissioner, I am still fully satisfied that Hoover was one of the parties guilty of the robbery.

I am also well satisfied that E. R. Shipley, postmaster, was in no way responsible for the loss, as no carelessness or negligence was shown upon his part in the investigation.

Mr. Shipley was called upon to make good the loss resulting from said robbery, and has paid the same in full. In my judgment he should be reimbursed for the amount thus paid.

Very respectfully,

J. J. HANNA.

Gen. WARREN P. EDGARTON,
Inspector in Charge, St. Louis, Mo.

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT, INSPECTOR'S OFFICE,
St. Louis, Mo., May 9, 1885.

SIR: I have the honor to forward you herewith a letter from Inspector Hanna, who investigated the loss of registered packages at your office by the theft of Hoover, and for which loss you paid $450. I considered it at that time a great hardship that you were compelled to make this loss good, and regretted that my duty called upon me to demand the money, but I have always worked upon the theory that, where the people intrust their money to the mail and it is lost while in the custody of employees of the Railway Mail Service, it should be made good.

You paid this money freely and without question upon my demand. I am of the opinion that you gave these registers the usual and ordinary care, and only lost them through the criminality of one of your clerks. If you can in any manner be reimbursed by the Government for the money paid on this account, I hope that you may accomplish this end.

Respectfully,

WARREN P. EDGARTON,
Inspector in Charge.

E. R. SHIPLEY, P. M.

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF ASSISTANT ATTORNEY-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., June 23, 1886.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your communication of date the 27th instant, relating to the loss of a registered package containing a sum of money. You state that Mr. Shipley, the postmaster at Springfield, Mo., from or in whose office the package was stolen, has paid the amount of the loss to the persons who were the losers by the theft, and that he wishes the Post-Office Department to make good the amount to him.

This can not be done. Revised Statutes, section 3925, provides that "the Post-Office Department or its revenues shall not be liable for the loss of any mail matter on account of its being registered."

The liability of the postmaster to the loser in such a case is one depending upon facts. Where a postmaster is guilty of no negligence in the premises, and a sworn assistant, appointed by him, steals the package, the postmaster is held not to be liable.

In Keenan vs. Southworth (110 Massachusetts, 474) it is said by Judge Gray: "The law is well settled in England and America that the Postmaster-General, the deputy postmasters, and their assistants and clerks, appointed and sworn as required by law, are public officers, each of whom is responsible for his own negligence only, and not for that of any of the others, though selected by him and subject to his orders." (Lane vs. Cotton, 1 Ld. Raym., 641; S. C. Mod., 42; Whitfield vs. De Spencer, Cowp., 754; Dunlop vs. Munroe, 7 Cranch, 242; Schreyer vs. Lynch, 8 Watts, 458; Bishop vs. Williamson, 2 Fairf., 440; Hutchins vs. Brackett, 2 Foster, 256.)

In the case in 7 Cranch the United States Supreme Court recognizes this doctrine and says that the liability of the postmaster will, in case of moneys lost in the mails, only result from his own neglect in not properly superintending the discharge of duties, when it is intended to charge him for the negligence of his assistants.

In numerous other cases the same rule is laid down, and seems to be clear that a postmaster would not be responsible for moneys stolen by a sworn clerk or assistant if the postmaster were guilty of no negligence in superintending the duties of his office or in keeping the dishonest official in employment.

This question of liability of postmasters to individuals is one that the courts, not the Post-Office Department, authoritatively decide. The inspector in this case probably deemed the postmaster negligent, and advised the payment. It was a matter, however, that the postmaster should have determined for himself, as it appears to me. Having paid it, he has no remedy against the Department.

Very respectfully,

EDWIN E. BRYANT,
Assistant Attorney-General Post-Office Department.

Hon. WILLIAM H. WADE,
House of Representatives.

SPRINGFIELD, Mo., January 15, 1886.

DEAR SIR: I examined the case of The United States vs. William Hoover, and although in my opinion the testimony of the witnesses that were examined in behalf of the United States was not strong enough as to facts to warrant his being held for trial, the circumstances pointed very strongly to him. In the examination of the case, which was very thorough and searching, and conducted by Hon. William Warner, who was one of the best prosecuting attorneys ever in this State, there were no facts disclosed to show any negligence or carelessness on the part of the postmaster, Mr. E. R. Shipley, and it was shown that Hoover handled this mail. There was no evidence to show that the registered matter had been handled in a careless way by the postmaster or his employees.

Respectfully,

MCLAIN JONES,
United States Commissioner.

Hon. WILLIAM H. WADE.

The bill is reported favorably with a recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. LOUD (during the reading of the report). I withdraw the demand for the further reading of the report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a statement in regard to this claim that comes from the Committee on Claims, so that the House may distinctly understand what is involved in it. This postmaster of Springfield, Mo., had in his employ a certain clerk that it is almost certain and conclusive stole the packages from the post-office. The postmaster, upon that statement of facts, paid the money to the Government, and now asks to be reimbursed for the theft of one of his deputies. Now, it is true that certain statements are in this report that tend to show that the postmaster was guilty of no negligence himself, but the question of negligence or freedom from negligence can not properly be decided by the Department; and you will find upon reading it over that one of the authorities there, the Assistant Attorney-General for the Post-Office Department, concludes this question in this way:

This question of liability of postmasters to individuals is one that the courts, not the Post-Office Department, authoritatively decide. The inspector in this case probably deemed the postmaster negligent, and advised the payment. It was a matter, however, that the postmaster should have determined for himself, as it appears to me. Having paid it, he has no remedy against the Department.

That is Edwin E. Bryant, Assistant Attorney-General for the Post-Office Department.

Now, I have serious objections to all these cases; but I have said to my friend here that it might come to a vote, and if the House desires to vote for it I will not raise the question of objection, but I am satisfied this claim ought not to pass the House.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

JOHN HAYS HAMMOND.

Mr. MAHANY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, That whereas the cable report announces that John Hays Hammond, otherwise described as Eugene Hammond, an American citizen, has been condemned to death for treason in the Transvaal, the Secretary of State take immediate action to safeguard the interests of said Hammond and exert the friendly offices of that Department in his behalf, if the Secretary of State, in his judgment, deems such interposition advisable.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I should like to ask whether this resolution has been submitted to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, or the chairman of that committee?

Mr. MAHANY. I may respond to the gentleman that, owing to the fact that the cable reports do not announce when this sentence will be carried into execution, I deem it unnecessary that this resolution should be submitted to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. The Secretary of State is fully competent to deal with the situation, which is a matter of life and death, and hence requires immediate action.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I should like to ask if the Secretary of State is not competent to deal with this question without this resolution?

Mr. MAHANY. Possibly it might escape his immediate attention, but with the authority of the House of Representatives back of this request there can be no doubt that the interests of this American will be fully safeguarded. I wish to say further that, as regards the English subjects condemned to death, the whole diplomacy and power of the British Government are certain to be exerted for the protection of their rights. It is quite likely that somebody will be made a scapegoat in the Transvaal affair, and I propose, not that any American who is guilty of wrong against a foreign Government shall escape the just consequences of his acts, but that an American citizen shall not be selected as a victim to be offered up on the altar of English conspiracy against the peace of the Boer Republic.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I will ask the gentleman if he is a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs?

Mr. MAHANY. I am not; but I am a member of this House, and as such I have a right to stand here for the protection of an American citizen anywhere on the globe. [Applause.]

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I will ask the gentleman from what source he has obtained the information that this American citizen is in danger?

Mr. MAHANY. From the published cable reports, which the gentleman must have seen if he has read his morning newspaper, and also through a dispatch from the Mail and Express, which reads:

NEW YORK, April 28.

Eugene Hammond, American, has been condemned to death for treason.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Eugene Hammond?

Mr. MAHANY. Yes. My resolution says "John Hays Hammond, otherwise described as Eugene Hammond." I hope the gentleman will not object to the immediate consideration of the resolution. This is a matter of urgent duty as well as a question of humanity. Nobody asks that this American shall escape the just consequences of his acts, but we do desire that immediate steps be taken to safeguard his interests and possibly his life.

Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky rose.

Mr. MAHANY. I have already yielded to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL]. I will yield later to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, a few weeks ago I wrote to the Secretary of State in regard to Mr. Hammond at the request of one of my constituents. I received the truly American reply that the State Department had no knowledge on the subject except what had been acquired from the newspapers, but that its impression was that Mr. Hammond's interests were being guarded by the English Government. It seems to me that it is high time that the American Government protected its own citizens abroad, and I am heartily in favor of this resolution. [Applause.]

Mr. MAHANY. I yield now to the gentleman from Kentucky. Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I have no doubt that the Secretary of State will discharge his duty fully in this matter, and that all American citizens will be protected as far as we can protect them. This is an important resolution. We have a committee of this House authorized to consider such matters. No one will be endangered by this resolution going to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. That committee will take it up and act upon it promptly, and there is, in my opinion, no reason why it should not go to the committee instead of being rushed through here.

Mr. MAHANY. Before the gentleman objects, will he permit me to say that I am perfectly willing that this resolution shall go to the Committee on Foreign Affairs if the committee will hold an immediate session for its consideration? But the matter is urgent, because this American citizen may be executed to-morrow.

Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky. The time for the regular meeting of the committee is the day after to-morrow. I do not see the chairman of the committee present. However, the Secretary of State understands the situation, and I have no doubt that without this resolution he will do all that the resolution asks him to do. He will do what he can to protect this American abroad, and that is what the resolution asks him to do.

Mr. MAHANY. Let me say to the gentleman that this resolution is not in the slightest degree a criticism upon the zeal of the Secretary of State. I join with the gentleman from Kentucky in high appreciation of the ability and activity of that official, but I do ask that this matter be brought immediately to his attention. Having had some experience with the details of work in the State Department, I know that frequently matters, unless they are marked "urgent," are delayed until after the season of their utility is past.

Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky. I have no doubt that the resolution will be considered by the Committee on Foreign Affairs at the earliest practicable time, and I must object to its consideration at this time by the House.

Mr. MAHANY. I observe that the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs [Mr. HITT] is in his place; and I will ask his opinion upon this subject.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Speaker, I raise the point of order that it is too late.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the special order, House bill No. 6739, for the relief of John N. Quackenbush.

CONDEMNED CANNON.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HOWELL] to call up a bill.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 7143) granting to the Soldiers and Sailors' Monument Association of the county of Middlesex, in the State of New Jersey, 4 condemned cannon and 30 cannon balls.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to deliver to the Soldiers and Sailors' Monument Association of the county of Middlesex, in the State of New Jersey, 4 condemned cannon and 30 cannon balls for the decoration of the soldiers and sailors' monument in said county; Provided, That the same can be spared without detriment to the service, and that no expense is thereby incurred by the Government.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HOWELL, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

JOHN N. QUACKENBUSH.

Mr. HENDERSON. I desire to submit a privileged report.

Mr. HEPBURN. I wish to call up House bill No. 6739.

The SPEAKER. The bill which the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] desires to call up was made a special order after the reading of the Journal to-day.

Mr. HENDERSON. I thought that bill had been disposed of. I beg my colleague's pardon. I withhold my report for the present.

The SPEAKER. The bill which is the special order will be read.

The bill (H. R. 6739) for the relief of John N. Quackenbush, late a commander in the Navy, was read, as follows:

Whereas John N. Quackenbush, late a commander in the United States Navy, was, during the month of February, in the year 1874, tried by a naval court-martial and sentenced to be dismissed from the service; and

Whereas said sentence of dismissal was, on the 9th day of June, 1874, by the President of the United States, Ulysses S. Grant, commuted to a suspension for six years on furlough pay, which sentence was fully served out until the date of the expiration thereof, to wit, on the 9th day of June, 1880, at which time the said John N. Quackenbush reported for duty to the proper authority at the Navy Department, and was by such proper authority placed upon waiting orders, and was, in all respects, recognized as and was in fact a commander in the United States Navy until August 1, 1883, having duly received his furlough pay until the expiration of his sentence of dismissal and his waiting orders pay until April 1, 1881, since which time and ever since his pay as such officer has been withheld; and

Whereas on the 10th day of June, 1874, the then President of the United States, Ulysses S. Grant, sent to the Senate of the United States the nomination of W. S. Schley to be a commander in the United States Navy, "vice Quackenbush, dismissed," which nomination was confirmed by the Senate on the 12th day of June, 1874, but it appearing to the then President of the United States and to the then Secretary of the United States Navy that the words "vice Quackenbush, dismissed," were inserted in said nominating paper by clerical inadvertence or mistake, and it not being the intention of said President to dismiss said John N. Quackenbush from the naval service, the vacancy created, shortly after said nomination of Schley, by the retirement of Commander Morris, was kept open for said Quackenbush, which said vacancy was duly filled by order of the Secretary of the Navy by the retention of said Quackenbush on the official naval list in the place of Morris, retired, until the 1st day of August, 1883, when the name of said John N. Quackenbush, in all respects and in fact a commander in the said service, was summarily dropped from said official naval list, and ordered not to be published again in the annually published register of the warrant and commissioned officers and others, by authority and direction of the then Secretary of said Navy, who, on December 13, 1883, recommended to the then President the nomination of Dennis W. Mullan, of Maryland, to be a commander in the United States Navy, "vice John N. Quackenbush, no longer in the service," which nomination was duly made by the President and confirmed by the Senate, said name of John N. Quackenbush being dropped as aforesaid by direction of said Secretary upon the authority of the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Blake vs. The United States (100 U. S. Supreme Court Reports, page 227) to the effect that the President could dismiss any officer in the Army or Navy, in time of peace, by the appointment of another person in his place; and

Whereas the said John N. Quackenbush attained the age of 62 years on the 30th day of May, 1896, and would, if legally an officer of the Navy, be entitled to be placed upon the retired list, and it has become manifest that the only remedy for the relief, legally or equitably, of the said John N. Quackenbush, is by an act of the Congress of the United States: Therefore

Be it enacted, etc., That the provisions of law regulating appointments in the Navy by promotion in the line, and limiting the number of commanders to be appointed in the United States naval service, are hereby suspended for the purpose of this act only, and only so far as they affect John N. Quackenbush; and the President of the United States is hereby authorized, in the exercise of his discretion and judgment, to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint said John N. Quackenbush, late a commander in the Navy of the United States, to the same grade and rank of commander in the United States Navy as of the date of August 1, 1883, and to place him on the retired list of the Navy as of the date of June 1, 1896, the same as if he had never been considered out of the service since his original entrance therein.

The amendments reported by the Committee on the Judiciary were read, as follows:

Strike out the preamble of the bill.

At the end of the bill strike out the words "the same as if he had never been considered out of the service since his original entrance therein" and insert the following:

"Provided, That he shall receive no pay or emoluments except from the date of such reappointment."

Mr. DINGLEY. Should not this bill receive its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole? I do not know whether the fact of the bill having been up before and having been postponed until to-day would change the operation of the rule in this case; but obviously the bill is one which under the ordinary rule should receive its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks perhaps the bill ought to be considered in Committee of the Whole, as it involves pay or emoluments to this officer.

Mr. DINGLEY. Certainly the bill involves an expenditure from the Treasury.

Mr. HEPBURN. I move, then, that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that this bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SAYERS. I object. I prefer that the bill should go to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HEPBURN. I think I can offer an amendment which will obviate the difficulty which gentlemen suggest.

The SPEAKER. The Chair now understands that on a former day unanimous consent was given for the consideration of this bill, and that thereupon it was postponed and made a special order for to-day.

Mr. HEPBURN. That is the fact.

The SPEAKER. And consent was given at that time for the consideration of the bill in the House?

Mr. HEPBURN. That is correct.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that under the circumstances the bill will have to be considered in the House.

Mr. HEPBURN. I ask unanimous consent to amend the amendment reported by the committee by striking out in lines 15 and 16 the words "June 1, 1895," and inserting "approval of this act," and by striking out in line 19 the word "reappointment" and inserting the word "retirement."

Mr. SAYERS. I should like to know from the gentleman in charge of this bill whether it is the intention to allow to those opposed to the measure an opportunity for discussion.

Mr. HEPBURN. I have no objection to that in the world.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent for an amendment before the discussion begins. The Clerk will report the proposed amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lines 15 and 16, on page 4, strike out the words "June 1, 1895," and insert "the approval of this act."

In line 19, same page, strike out the word "reappointment" and insert "retirement."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to this amendment? The Chair hears none; and the amendment will be considered as adopted.

Mr. HEPBURN. I now yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] so much time as he may desire.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, this bill proposes to restore to the Navy and place upon the retired list a man who has been dismissed from the Navy in accordance with a finding of a court-martial. I know it may appear somewhat ungracious for anyone to stand on this floor and oppose what this man's friends claim is simply the correction of an injustice done him by reason of the action of the Navy Department. I will content myself on this occasion with the reading of his record, so that members of the House may decide for themselves whether it is of such a character as to justify them in passing the bill.

I will first ask the Clerk to read an abstract (furnished by the Secretary of the Navy) of the man's record of service, and I trust that members will attend to the reading.

The Clerk read as follows:

Abstract of the record of service of John N. Quackenbush, late a commander in the United States Navy.

John N. Quackenbush was appointed a midshipman in the Navy September 24, 1847, and on the 15th day of October of that year he was ordered to the U. S. S. Cumberland. He was warranted a midshipman July 26, 1848, and in October following was detached from the Cumberland and ordered to the Naval Academy, where he remained until April 9, 1849, when he was detached and ordered to the U. S. S. Falmouth, from which vessel he was transferred to the U. S. S. Baritan. He was detached from the latter vessel January 27, 1853, and granted three months' leave of absence. On the 18th of May, 1853, he was ordered to the practice ship Preble, where he remained until the 7th of October following, when he was detached and ordered to the Naval Academy, and while there he was dismissed from the naval service for drunkenness January 3, 1854.

On the 19th of May, 1861, Mr. Quackenbush, who had then been out of the service seven years four months and ten days, was appointed an acting lieutenant in the Navy, and ordered to report to the commandant of the navy-yard, Boston, Mass., for duty. On the 23d of May, 1861, he was ordered to the Gulf Squadron, and served on board the U. S. S. Colorado. He was sent from that squadron, in charge of the prize bark Macao, to Philadelphia, Pa., and after delivering the vessel to the United States authorities at that place, October 4, 1861, he was ordered to Hampton Roads, Virginia, for duty in the squadron under the command of Flag Officer L. M. Goldsborough, and was assigned to the U. S. S. Pandalia, where he remained until February 9, 1862, when he was detached and placed on waiting orders. On the 10th of March, 1862, his restoration to the Regular Navy, in the grade of lieutenant-commander, to rank from July 16, 1862, was confirmed by the Senate, and on the 21st of March of that year he was ordered to the U. S. S. San Jacinto, where he remained until March 14, 1863, when he was detached and placed on waiting orders. He was ordered May 3, 1863, to the receiving ship at New York, and on the 11th of October following, he was detached from that duty and placed on waiting orders. On the 18th of December of that year he was ordered to the U. S. S. Macdonough, to report for duty on the 5th of January following. He was detached from the command of that vessel April 23, 1867, and placed on waiting orders.

On the 5th of August, 1867, Lieutenant-Commander Quackenbush was ordered to command the U. S. S. Fantic, and he remained in command of that vessel until January 6, 1868, when he was detached and placed on waiting orders. He was ordered to examination for promotion April 3, 1868, and having appeared before the board, at Philadelphia, Pa., he was found not qualified for promotion. The finding of the board in his case is as follows:

"After maturely considering all the evidence, the undersigned, a majority of the board, are of the opinion that the mental, moral, and professional fitness of Lieut. Commander John N. Quackenbush to perform all his duties at sea in a higher grade is not satisfactorily established."

It appearing in this case that the board were not unanimous in their opinion, and that the depositions of witnesses had been taken whose testimony was material and who might, without inconvenience, have been present for oral examination, the President of the United States declined to approve the report of the board, and directed a reexamination of the case. A new board was therefore ordered to convene at the navy-yard, New York, July 7, 1868, for the purpose of inquiring into and reporting upon the case of Lieutenant-Commander Quackenbush. The board convened on the 8th of that month, and Lieutenant-Commander Quackenbush having appeared before the board, his case was reexamined, and the board reported their finding as follows:

"The board having examined all the testimony sent by the Department and witnesses called both by the Government and Lieutenant-Commander Quackenbush, and having maturely considered the same, have concluded that it can not recommend Lieutenant-Commander Quackenbush be promoted to a higher grade in the United States Navy."

On the 17th of July, 1868, Lieutenant-Commander Quackenbush, having failed to receive the recommendation of the examining board for promotion, was placed on the retired list of the Navy, in conformity with the fourth section of the act of April 21, 1864.

On the 23d of April, 1869, Lieutenant-Commander Quackenbush was ordered to duty at League Island, Pa., where he remained until October 1, 1870, when he was detached and placed on waiting orders.

By authority of a joint resolution of Congress approved February 6, 1871, Lieutenant-Commander Quackenbush was restored to the active list of the Navy May 4, 1871, to rank from September 29, 1869. On the 12th of May, 1871, he was ordered to examination for promotion. The board before which he appeared found him qualified for promotion, and he was accordingly promoted to the grade of commander May 25, 1871. The report of the board is as follows:

"The board, in accordance with the law, have examined Lieut. Commander John N. Quackenbush as to his moral, mental, physical, and professional fitness for promotion to the grade of commander. The records of the Department show that this officer has been twice examined for promotion, by two boards of officers. The findings in either case did not recommend him for promotion, and consequently he was placed on the retired list. Since then, by a law of Congress and the approval of the President, Lieutenant-Commander Quackenbush has been restored to the active list. The board does not therefore consider it its duty to go behind the action of the highest authority in this case, and this officer having passed a satisfactory examination before this board, he is accordingly recommended for promotion."

On the 9th of June, 1871, Commander Quackenbush was ordered to command the U. S. S. Wasp on the South Atlantic station. He remained in command of that vessel until February 17, 1873, when he was detached, ordered home, and placed on waiting orders.

In February, 1874, Commander Quackenbush was tried before a general court-martial for drunkenness, sentenced to dismissal, and the sentence was approved June 5, 1874, and he was dismissed June 9, 1874.

On the 10th of June, 1874, Lieut. Commander W. S. Schley was nominated for promotion to the grade of commander from that date, vice Commander John N. Quackenbush, dismissed; which nomination was confirmed by the Senate on the 12th of the same month.

It appears from the records of the Department that, under date of June 12, 1874, the Secretary of the Navy addressed a letter to Commander Quackenbush, requesting him to return the order dismissing him from the Navy; that the latter returned the order referred to in a letter dated June 15, 1874; that his name was thereupon omitted from the navy list in the Navy Register, which was published in July, 1874; that about six months later, December 8, 1874, the following letter was addressed to Commander Quackenbush by the Secretary of the Navy, informing him that the sentence of dismissal in his case was mitigated to suspension from rank and duty, on furlough pay:

"The naval general court-martial by which you were tried in February last found you guilty of the charges preferred against you and sentenced you to be dismissed from the naval service of the United States. This sentence was, on the 9th day of June, 1874, mitigated to suspension from rank and duty, on furlough pay, for six years, the suspension to date from that date."

Commander Quackenbush's name was restored to the navy list and appeared in the list of commanders in the Annual Navy Register issued in January, 1875.

Commander Quackenbush remained under suspension until the 9th of June, 1880, the date of the expiration of the mitigated sentence of the court, and his name was continued in the Navy Register until August 1, 1883, on which date, in view of the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Charles M. Blake vs. The United States (18 Otto, 527), his name was dropped from the navy list.

Mr. SAYERS. I desire to submit also in this connection a copy of a letter addressed by the Secretary of the Navy (Hon. William E. Chandler) to Hon. EUGENE HALE on the 12th of February, 1885, when a bill for his restoration to the Navy was pending before Congress.

The Clerk read as follows:

[Copy.]

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, February 12, 1885.

SIR: The receipt is acknowledged of your letter of the 5th instant, in which, by direction of your committee, information is desired, and also the views of the Department concerning the bill S. 2512, "touching the grade of commander in the Navy, and to correct an error in relation to an appointment thereto."

The bill names John N. Quackenbush five times in the preamble and twice in the body of the act, and was drawn solely with the view of effecting the appointment of the person so named to the office he once held, as commander in the United States Navy.

The bill, however, carefully omits to narrate certain facts important to be considered. It states that said Quackenbush, a commander in the Navy, was, on June 9, 1874, in pursuance and in mitigation of a court-martial, suspended by the President for six years on furlough pay. It does not state for what offense he was tried nor what was his sentence. The report also made by your committee March 6, 1884 (Forty-eighth Congress, first session, Report No. 275), which appears to contain a full history of the case, says of the court-martial only that "he was tried by a naval court-martial in February, 1874, and sentenced to dismissal," but fails to state for what offense he was tried. The omitted facts are as follows:

On the 9th of June, 1871, Commander Quackenbush was ordered to command the U. S. S. Wasp on the South Atlantic Station. He remained in command of that vessel until February 17, 1873, when he was detached, ordered home, and placed on waiting orders. In February, 1874, he was tried before a general court-martial on the following charges and specifications:

Charge I.—Drunkenness. Specification 1. That on or about the 16th day of May, in the year 1872, the said Commander J. N. Quackenbush, then in command of the U. S. S. Wasp, was drunk on board the English mail steamer Donoro at Montevideo.

Specification 2. In this, that on or about the 20th day of June, in the year 1872, the said Commander J. N. Quackenbush, then in command of the U. S. S. Wasp, was drunk on board the said vessel at Colonia, Uruguay.

Specification 3. In this, that on or about the 8th day of June, in the year 1872, the said Commander J. N. Quackenbush, then in command of the U. S. S. Wasp, was scandalously drunk at a ball given by the Club Libertad, at Montevideo, and deported himself in such a manner as to disgrace the uniform of an officer of the United States Navy.

Charge II.—Scandalous conduct tending to the destruction of good morals. Specification 1. In this, that during the months of April, May, and June, in the year 1872, the said Commander J. N. Quackenbush, being then in command of the U. S. S. Wasp, indulged to excess in the use of intoxicating liquor.

Specification 2. In this, that on or about the 3d day of June, in the year 1872, the said Commander J. N. Quackenbush, then in command of the U. S. S. Wasp, in consequence of excessive use of intoxicating liquor, was in such a condition as to require to be medically treated for alcoholism.

Commander Quackenbush was found guilty of all the specifications and both the charges, and was sentenced by the court "to be dismissed from the naval service of the United States." The sentence of dismissal was confirmed by the President on the 5th of June, 1874, and in a letter dated the 9th of the same month the Department informed Commander Quackenbush of the sentence of the court and the action of the President thereon, and that he would from that date cease to be an officer of the Navy. It further appears that Commander Quackenbush commenced his naval career with drunkenness. September 24, 1847, he became a midshipman and served on shipboard and at the Naval Academy, and January 3, 1854, he was dismissed by the following letter:

"NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, January 3, 1854.

"Sir: As you have again been reported to the Department for drunkenness, I have to inform you that you are dismissed from the service, and will, from this date, no longer be regarded as a midshipman in the Navy.

"I am, respectfully, etc.,

"J. C. DOBBIN, Secretary of the Navy.

"Midshipman JOHN QUACKENBUSH,
"Naval Academy."

May 13, 1861, Mr. Quackenbush was appointed an acting lieutenant in the Navy. On two examinations as to his mental, moral, and professional fitness for promotion he was reported as disqualified, and thus, at last, forced on the retired list. Congress by special act restored him to the active list. The abstract of his record of service, herewith transmitted, shows how he managed to pass his examination for promotion. Three years afterwards he was, as above stated, tried for drunkenness and dismissed.

The fact from which it is argued that Mr. Quackenbush should be restored to the Navy is that six months after the President had, June 5, 1874, approved his sentence of dismissal and had, on June 9, 1874, actually dismissed him, the Secretary of the Navy, on the 8th of December, 1874, addressed to him a letter stating that his sentence had been, on the 9th of June, 1874, mitigated to suspension from rank and duty on furlough pay, for six years. Letters are also produced from ex-President Grant, dated February 10, 1882, and from ex-Secretary Robeson, dated February 16, 1882, in which they say they are quite sure the sentence was mitigated June 9, 1874.

Without intending any reflection upon the distinguished signers of these letters, it is permissible to say that it will not be wise to base action upon the recollections of ex-officers made eight years after official transactions have occurred, the effect of which, as recorded, they are besought to vary by their subsequent unofficial statements. The record shows a formal dismissal of Quackenbush on the 9th of June. On the 10th of June W. S. Schley was nominated to the Senate "vice Quackenbush, dismissed," and was confirmed June 12. No record whatever of the alleged mitigation has ever appeared, and no such record was in fact ever made, either on the 9th of June or at any time afterwards. Only on the 8th of December the Secretary wrote a letter stating that the sentence had been in fact mitigated June 9. Contemporaneous evidence of mitigation is entirely wanting.

June 12, 1874, the Secretary wrote Mr. Quackenbush, at Boston, to return the letter of dismissal, and on June 15 it was so returned. This may indicate an intention in the mind of the Secretary to consider an attempt to review the case and reverse the dismissal, but he, in fact, made no such attempt until December 8, and the very circumstance that he wrote the letter of June 12, and yet did nothing more till December, is strong evidence that no mitigation had been in fact made on June 9. If it had not been made on the latter date, it could not be made afterwards, and Quackenbush was irrevocably ejected from the Navy, according to the decision of the Supreme Court in Blake vs. The United States (13 Otto, 227).

The reason why an officer should not, on any pretext, be restored to the Navy who has been twice dismissed for drunkenness, once as a midshipman and once as a commander, is very evident. My views on this question have been expressed in a court-martial order, dated May 20, 1884, and a letter concerning the same, dated May 30, 1884, and also in a letter to the chairman of your committee, dated June 18, 1884. Copies of which are hereto annexed.

Consider for a moment the result of such a restoration. It places the officer on the active list. He then stands in order for sea duty. When his turn comes shall he, with his record, be sent to sea? What Secretary would dare to send him, perhaps to sink ships and seamen, as another drunken and dismissed commander, forced back into the Navy by act of Congress, did sink the Albatross and destroy eleven lives? If he is not to go to sea in his turn, why should he stand upon the active list, preventing the promotion of a faultless naval officer, and disgracing an honorable profession?

Such worthless officers distributed along the list bring the whole personnel into disrepute. With all the force which I can properly exert, and all the feeling I have any right to exhibit, I protest against the restoration of persons who are, or ever have been, drunkards to the active list of the Navy.

The unconstitutionality of this bill should also, in my judgment, prevent its passage. Any act of Congress which in effect directs or requires the appointment of a particular person named, or an officer of the United States, is an encroachment upon the Presidential power of appointment, and is, therefore, unconstitutional and void, because, by section 2 of Article II of the Constitution, all officers of the United States (excepting certain special classes of appointees) are to be appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate; and the legislative branch of the Government, being the Congress, composed of the Senate and House, authorized to legislate concurrently, with the approval of the President, or without such approval, if by a two-thirds vote, can constitutionally take no part in the function of appointment.

The above propositions are not disputed by the advocates of such bills, but they are claimed to be inapplicable to the various statutes which have been enacted or are proposed.

It is argued that as the statutes only give authority to appoint, and do not contain mandatory words, the President still retains his discretion, and therefore there is no interference with his prerogative.

It may be replied that the effect of such statutes is compulsory. If the selection of the particular individuals to nominate and, with the consent of the Senate, to appoint to office is the sole prerogative of the President, he is entitled to exercise it absolutely free from even the appearance of pressure or interference from the Legislature. The word "may" is often construed as "shall," and the word "authorized" as "directed." The passage of an act of legislation creating an office to which a named individual, if anyone, must be appointed, or authorizing the appointment to a specified office of that individual, is a legislative device for placing that particular person in office, and in effect is a coercion by the legislature of the appointing power, which is not mitigated by merely using the words "may" and "authorize" instead of "shall" and "directed."

If the public interests require a new office to be created, the Legislature may create it. If these interests require that a particular person should fill it, it is to be presumed that the President will select him. But the privilege of directing him to do so does not exist in the Legislature, and introducing the particular person's name into the act in any connection savors of coercion. To say that it is inserted as mere advice is disingenuous. In every case there is a condition without compliance with which the legislation is inoperative, namely, the condition that the designated person and no other shall be appointed. This is not advice, but requirement. If advice merely is meant, the Executive is entitled to be treated to it in some other form than one which requires him to affix his signature of approval to the advice before he considers whether it will be wise to follow it. The essence of this whole vicious system of special legislation is practical coercion of the appointing power. Eliminate that element, and bills to reach special cases will rarely be desired.

II. Precedents for bills of this character are cited. It is admitted that there are such; enough to show that a dangerous and injurious practice has lately arisen, but they are too few and too recent to fix irrevocably an erroneous construction of the plain language of the Constitution. The first special statute that can be discovered in the naval records was that of Capt. Charles Stewart, on March 2, 1859. The first case in the Army appears to have been that of Maj. James Belger, on March 3, 1871. February 29, 1861, the grade of Lieutenant-General was revived, but no mention was made of the officer to be appointed. July 25, 1860, the grade of general was revived, but Congress carefully refrained from naming the appointee.

All earlier legislation of the Republic under our present Constitution creating offices avoided specifying the persons to be appointed. The Congress of the old Confederacy had the power of appointing all officers of the land forces in the service of the United States, excepting regimental officers, appointing all the officers of the naval force and commissioning all officers in the service of the United States. But from the adoption of the present Constitution in 1787, vesting the appointing power in the Executive, for about eighty years no discovery was made of the existence of the legislative power of appointment in the Congress of the United States, which is now set up. The occasion has arisen for returning to the correct construction of the Constitution and establishing the true line of separation between the legislative and executive branches of the Government. Gradual encroachments of one branch upon the other will not be infrequent in the working of our system. The opportunities which may occur for retreating from such encroachments should always be unhesitatingly and courageously seized. By a frequent recurrence to the fundamental principles of the Constitution will its vigor be best preserved.

III. The laws requiring promotions in the Army and Navy to be made according to seniority of rank are mentioned. But general laws regulating the power of appointments are not usurpations of it. The right to regulate and even limit by law the power may be conceded, while the right to actually exercise it is denied and resisted. The line of distinction can easily be drawn between a law prescribing general rules and restrictions to govern the method of making appointments and a law naming a particular appointee. The one may be constitutional; the other is not.

IV. It is said that if such laws are unconstitutional no reparation can be made where an officer, by final sentence of a court-martial, has been dismissed from office, but it afterwards clearly appears that he was innocent and his punishment undeserved. The assertion is incorrect. Reparation in such case may be made, but it must be done constitutionally. To effect it the Legislature can neither annul a final judgment of a court, nor exercise the appointing power. If a judgment is for the payment of money, the Legislature can not destroy the sanctity of the judgment, but it may release or return the amount. Whatever reparation or restitution can be afforded by legislation alone, the Legislature may undoubtedly give. But where such can not be given without an appointment to office the Legislature must stop short. If the creation of a new office is necessary, the Legislature may create it, but can not say that it shall be filled by the appointment of the particular individual who has lost a similar office. Whether or not to make that portion of the reparation is the exclusive prerogative of the Executive, and while deciding the question he is entitled to be absolutely free from any apparent or actual coercion by the legislative branch of the Government.

V. If it is conceived that the law now proposed obviates the objections to the requirement of the appointment of a named person, an examination of the bill will dispel that opinion.

It is true that the enacting clause varies from the form heretofore used in such cases. Instead of saying that the President shall appoint Quackenbush a commander in the Navy, it says that he "shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate appoint a commander who shall take rank and position in the Navy as and of the time of the suspension of said Quackenbush * * * or such commander so appointed shall receive pay from the date when said suspension took place."

The act also declares that if the President shall "appoint said Quackenbush" he shall not be overpaid; and it also names Quackenbush five times in the preamble, reciting the facts in his case (except his conviction and dismissal for drunkenness), and it declares the purpose of the act to be to restore him to the same rank and position "as if said dismissal had not been made." If there is the least weight in the constitutional objection to acts of Congress for the appointment to offices of the United States of particular persons named in the acts this bill is obnoxious in the fullest degree. The attempted evasions of the objection only make the intended coercion more apparent. It peremptorily commands the Executive, if he does not appoint Quackenbush, to appoint some other person, who shall be a commander with the rank and position which Quackenbush had when dismissed in June, 1874, and who shall receive pay from the date of that dismissal; that is, eleven years' pay as a commander, without being in office or serving the Government a single day during the whole period. Surely this is not merely the creation of an office, leaving it discretionary with the President to determine who shall fill it.

Very respectfully,

WM. E. CHANDLER,
Secretary of the Navy.

Hon. EUGENE HALE,
United States Senate, Member Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. HEPBURN (before the reading was concluded). I call the attention of the gentleman from Texas to the fact that the portion of the letter which the Clerk is now reading is not pertinent to this bill.

Mr. SAYERS. The reading will be concluded in a few moments.

Mr. HEPBURN. This bill has none of the features that the letter of the Secretary of the Navy as now read comments upon.

Mr. SAYERS. The House will so understand. The reading will only take a few minutes longer.

Mr. HEPBURN. I thought perhaps the reading of those portions of the letter might be an unnecessary consumption of time, as this part of the document is not pertinent to this bill.

Mr. SAYERS. I would like to have the reading of the letter concluded.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I have nothing to add to the record of Mr. Quackenbush as read in the presence of the House. If members of the House with these facts before them can vote to restore him to the Navy and place him on the retired list, they will do so, it seems to me, in the face of a very bad record, and despite anything else that can be said against him.

Mr. STEELE. I have tried to listen carefully to the reading of this report. There was, as I understand, an order made by the President mitigating the sentence of the court-martial (which provided for dismissal from the service) to suspension for six years.

Mr. SAYERS. It is so stated.

Mr. STEELE. Now, as I understand from the reading, that order was made about six years after the dismissal.

Mr. SAYERS. No; it is claimed by the friends of the bill that the order of mitigation was made on June 9, 1874, though no record of such order is to be found at the Navy Department.

Mr. STEELE. And further, if the gentleman will permit me in that same line, I gather from the reading of the report that there was some doubt as to whether the President had written or ordered such a letter at all as that which emanated from the Secretary of the Navy without any authority.

Mr. SAYERS. The record shows that on the 9th day of June, 1874, Mr. Quackenbush was dismissed from the service. I will read from the record in verification of the date stated. The record shows that in February, 1874, Commander Quackenbush was tried before a general court-martial and sentenced to dismissal, and the sentence approved June 5, 1874, and he was dismissed June 9, 1874. On the 10th of June, 1874, Lieutenant-Commander Schley was nominated for promotion to the grade of commander from that date, vice Commander John N. Quackenbush, dismissed, which nomination was confirmed by the Senate on the 12th day of the same month.

Mr. STEELE. That would put Quackenbush out whether the court-martial proceedings had been held or not.

Mr. SAYERS (continuing). And here is the situation that appears with reference to this matter from the papers which are on file in the Department:

It appears from the records of the Department that under date of June 12, 1874, the Secretary of the Navy addressed a letter to Commander Quackenbush, requesting him to return the order dismissing him from the Navy.

Let it be noted, Mr. Speaker, that this was on June 12, 1874, three days after he was dismissed, and two days after Lieutenant-Commander Schley was nominated, and on the very same day that the Senate confirmed his nomination.

That Quackenbush returned the order referred to in a letter dated June 15, 1874; that his name was thereupon omitted from the Navy list in the Navy Register, which was published in July, 1874; and about six months later, December 8, 1874, a letter was addressed to Commander Quackenbush by the Secretary of the Navy, informing him that the sentence of dismissal in his case was mitigated to suspension from rank and duty on furlough pay.

Mr. STEELE. But I understood in the Chandler letter that there was no authority for the Secretary of the Navy to make such a statement or order, and that the President had not authorized him to do so.

Mr. SAYERS. He says there was no record of any such order.

Mr. STEELE. Yes.

Mr. SAYERS. He also says that the only record is the letter that was written by the Secretary of the Navy on the 12th of June, 1874, to Commander Quackenbush, requesting him to return the order; and that on the 15th day of June, 1874, Quackenbush returned the order. But it was not until December 8, 1874, that the letter was written by the Secretary of the Navy to Quackenbush, informing him that the sentence had been mitigated to suspension from rank and command. This is all I think necessary to say in connection with the matter.

Mr. STEELE. But there was no authority for this letter of the Secretary of the Navy, apparently.

Mr. SAYERS. Apparently, no.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, the question presented by the pending bill is as to whether or not Congress will do an act of justice to a man who was once in its service. I have nothing to say, and it is not necessary for me to say anything, in connection with this discussion or to make any reply to what has been said in regard to the letter of the Secretary of the Navy or with reference to the charges which seem to have been substantiated against this officer in the trial before the court-martial. All of these matters were matters that were known to the Department and to the President at the time he mitigated the punishment, or rather the sentence, of the court-martial from dismissal to a suspension. And I might say here that all the testimony—and there is much of it—goes to show and does show that for years, ever since the action of the President in the case, the life of this officer has been without reproach. No charge of any kind is made against him or his decorous conduct, and there is much proof to show that he has been entirely free from this vice ever since.

This letter of the Secretary of the Navy, in which the statement is made so confidently that he ceases to be an officer of the United States on the 9th day of June, 1874, seems to be disproved by this fact, that his dismissal from the register did not occur until a late date, 1882, and for more than a year after the writer of that letter was Secretary of the Navy.

The name of Commander Quackenbush stood upon the register, he drew his pay during all this period, and that, it seems to me, ought to be a sufficient answer. But, further, it is intimated in the letter and stated by the gentleman on the floor in this discussion that a long time after the approval of the sentence this attempted or asserted mitigation of the sentence occurred. I want to call attention to a copy of a letter I have in my hand. General Grant writes, under date of February 10, 1882:

I remember of Commander Quackenbush, but not the details of my action. I have no doubt, however, but that the Hon. George M. Robeson, then Secretary of the Navy, knows and remembers all about it.

I do know, however, the intention was not to put him out of the service, and I now recommend his nomination to the vacancy which was kept open for him from the time of the first vacancy after the promotion of Schley.

The fact that Executive action was delayed so long in the case of Commander Quackenbush—

This refers to the fact that the court-martial occurred in the early part of 1874 and the action upon that report did not occur until June—

The fact that Executive action was delayed so long in the case of Commander Quackenbush, at the request of Mr. Samuel Howe, shows quite conclusively that the approval of the sentence and commutation were done at one and the same time. My decision was probably given verbally to the Secretary, and the mistake in the record has been made by a clerk.

Very truly, yours,

U. S. GRANT.

There is proof most conclusive that the act of clemency was not an afterthought, that it did not occur six months after, as suggested by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS], but that it was concurrent with the other action. But again, here is a letter from the then Secretary of the Navy. I read only the part that is pertinent here:

The action of approval and mitigation was at one and the same time, whatever the records in the Department may appear to show. The direction to me being verbal, and a letter being sent by me at once to Commander Quackenbush, and afterwards, in December, the letter promulgating the finding and mitigation, I may have rested content with my action and neglected to order or to make full indorsement on the records.

Now, this clearly shows that the order of appointment of Schley "vice Quackenbush" was an error committed in some incomprehensible way by the Department.

But, Mr. Speaker, this matter has been inquired into by one of the courts of this District. An application for a writ of mandamus directed to the Hon. Hilary A. Herbert, Secretary of the Navy, commanding him to cause the name of the relator to be restored to the Official Register of the commissioned, warrant, and volunteer officers of the Navy of the United States, and to cause the same to be printed upon the list of commanders in the next lawfully authorized publication of that Register, was begun in this suit. As I am informed, there was a full investigation of all the facts in connection with the matter, all that the Government could say and all that the relator had to say. The court refused the writ, because it had no jurisdiction of that matter, but the court in its decision goes on to discuss the case and says:

The situation of the relator seems to be remediless save by Congressional action. He appears to have been effectually displaced from the service by inadvertence or by accident in 1874, and by purpose and design in 1883.

The court goes on to say:

The inadvertence or mistake in the nomination of Schley "vice Quackenbush, dismissed" is demonstrated by the fact of the commutation of his sentence by the President on June 9, 1874, to six years' suspension; by his retention on the list as commander, suspended from rank and duty on furlough pay until July 9, 1880; by his being then placed on waiting orders, and drawing the appropriate pay until April, 1881, and by the keeping for him unfilled during these years a vacant position of commander.

He was dropped in 1883 because of the decision in the Blake case, and his displacement was intentionally made effectual, and the lack of intention in the displacement of 1874 emphasized by the nomination to and confirmation by the Senate in December, 1883, of Mullan, "vice John N. Quackenbush, no longer in the service."

That was in 1883, mind you, gentlemen. All of these years the Navy Department recognized the fact that this man was not dismissed in 1874. All these years they recognized the fact that there was clemency shown to him, and that he was still in the Navy on retired pay. The court goes on further to say:

The correction of this error from which Commander Quackenbush has so long suffered would be a simple act of justice. It should be corrected not only as matter of righting a wrong to an injured and powerless citizen, but as a matter of honor on the part of a great and just Government. The remedy, however, is not in the courts, but in Congress.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not care to occupy more time. I believe this is a simple act of justice. This man has suffered the full punishment inflicted upon him by the court and approved by the President. His sentence expired in June, 1880. For nearly sixteen years he has been striving to secure remedy for this gross wrong. I believe the House ought to pass this bill. He will now go upon the retired list. He is an old man, not fit for active service, and placing him on the retired list is but inadequate and incomplete justice in his case.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the committee amendment. The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to. The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time.

The question being taken on the passage of the bill, on a division (demanded by Mr. SAYERS) there were—ayes 59, noes 17.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I am not willing that this bill should be passed by such a vote as this. If the gentleman will allow a yea-and-nay vote to be taken to-morrow morning, just after the reading of the Journal, that will be satisfactory.

Mr. HEPBURN. Let us take it now.

Mr. SAYERS. There is not a quorum here now.

Mr. HEPBURN. I think there is, or will be.

Mr. SAYERS. Very well, let us have the yeas and nays.

Mr. BAILEY. Before the announcement is made, of course, it is understood that my colleague does not lose the right to make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the vote be taken by yeas and nays. Is there objection?

Mr. FAIRCHILD. I object.

Mr. SAYERS. No quorum, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays are demanded—

Mr. SAYERS. After conferring with the gentleman from Iowa, I understand that he has no objection to having an order entered directing that a yea-and-nay vote be taken to-morrow.

Mr. HEPBURN. I think upon reflection I should prefer to have the vote taken now. I think there is a quorum here.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Texas make the point of no quorum?

Mr. SAYERS. No quorum, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER proceeded to count the House. Pending the count,

Mr. SAYERS said: Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman withdraws the point of no quorum and demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 163, nays 48, not voting 144; as follows:

So the bill was passed.

Mr. STALLINGS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to know how I am recorded?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not recorded.

Mr. STALLINGS. I desire to vote.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman present when his name was called?

Mr. STALLINGS. I answered, but they did not get it down.

The name of Mr. STALLINGS was then called, and he voted "yea."

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, I am paired with the gentleman from Maine, Mr. BOUTELLE.

The following additional pairs were announced:

On this question:

Mr. SOUTHWICK with Mr. ELLIOTT of South Carolina.

Mr. CANNON with Mr. BANKHEAD.

Mr. HULING with Mr. MEYER.

Mr. BABCOCK with Mr. RICHARDSON.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. HEPBURN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

COMMITTEE APPOINTMENT.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of Mr. ELLETT of Virginia on the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged report. The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Rules, having had under consideration resolution No. 274, report the same back to the House with the following substitute, the adoption of which is hereby recommended:

Resolved, The House shall, immediately upon the passage of this resolution, enter upon the consideration of House bill 8110, "A bill to establish a uniform law on the subject of bankruptcy throughout the United States"; that the remainder of this day and Wednesday, April 20, and Thursday, April 20, shall be devoted to general debate upon said bill; that Friday, May 1, and

Saturday, May 2, until 4 o'clock p. m., shall be devoted to the consideration of said bill under the five-minute rule; and at 4 o'clock p. m., May 2, the bill shall be reported, with any amendments that may have been adopted, to the House, and the previous questions shall be considered as ordered on said bill and amendments to its final passage.

Mr. HENDERSON. I move the previous question.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, as my friend from Iowa understands, there may be two substitutes offered, and possibly there will be, and probably under the rule we would only have an opportunity to offer one. I am willing to simply take his assurance, that if the friends of voluntary bankruptcy desire to submit two substitutes they shall have the right to do it.

Mr. HENDERSON. I have only heard of one, but of course it is nothing but fair to those who are in favor of voluntary bankruptcy that they should have an opportunity to offer a substitute.

Mr. BAILEY. I may say that there are those who desire that the estate shall be administered under the State laws and distributed according to the State laws, and there are others who desire a purely voluntary system, who desire that the administration of the estate should be regulated by the law in the Federal courts. It is possible we may get in one substitute, and it is possible two. I desire to offer a separate substitute. With that understanding, I am entirely satisfied.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa demands the previous question.

The previous question was ordered, and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent of the House that general leave to print may be given for ten days from this time, as it will be impossible for all to get an opportunity to address the House.

Mr. McMILLIN. On the bankruptcy bill?

Mr. HENDERSON. On the bankruptcy bill alone. [After a pause.] At the request of gentlemen around me I will modify that request by making it ten days from the conclusion of the debate, as it will probably be more convenient then.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that leave to print on the subject of the resolution be given for ten days, commencing with the close of the debate. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The resolution speaks of being reported with any amendments which may have been adopted.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, I think it would probably be well, and I think the gentleman in charge of the resolution would have no objection, to have it apply also to the amendments pending. That will make it possible for two amendments to be voted on in addition to the substitutes to be voted on by the House.

Mr. HENDERSON. I would be willing, under the understanding, that it should apply to the substitute, but I do not want it to apply to all amendments.

Mr. McMILLIN. I would suggest to the gentleman that there can be only two amendments pending—one amendment and an amendment to the amendment, and an amendment to the substitute pending; so that he would have very little trouble.

Mr. HENDERSON. I would suggest to my colleague on the Committee on Rules if we permit a vote on two substitutes that will be enough to cover it. I call the attention of the gentleman in charge of the matter on the minority to this question, whether that would be satisfactory. I suppose it will be to have a vote on both substitutes in the House.

Mr. BAILEY. That was the understanding I strove to arrive at a moment ago.

The SPEAKER. Is it understood that this bill shall be considered in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. HENDERSON. I was going to move to go into Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. That may be interpreted as the meaning of the rule. If there be no objection, that can be the understanding of the rule, though without an agreement that construction might be doubtful. The gentleman moves to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of this bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. PAYNE in the chair.

BANKRUPTCY BILL.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8110) to establish a uniform law on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read the bill in part.

Mr. HENDERSON (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the further reading of the bill.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. HENDERSON. Now, Mr. Chairman, I would like to reach an understanding with the gentlemen representing the other view of the case as to the division of the time for debate, and I suggest that one-half be controlled by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] and the other half by myself.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, I suggest to the gentleman that there are really three sides to this controversy, and I think an entirely fair division would be to divide the time into three equal parts, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] to control one-third, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BRODERICK] to control one-third, and I should be glad to control the remaining third.

Mr. HENDERSON. I had thought of asking for two-thirds of the time, because of the great majority here in favor of a bankruptcy bill that is a bankruptcy bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. BRODERICK. If there is such a majority, then you do not need the time for argument on your side.

Mr. HENDERSON. I know, but gentlemen want to be heard. I thought I had reached an understanding with the gentleman from Texas as to the division of time.

Mr. BAILEY. The gentleman did reach an understanding with me, Mr. Chairman, purely because I could not help myself [laughter]; but I admonished him that I should ask for a division into three parts. If that can not be had, I suggest that the gentleman modify his proposition so as to provide that the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BRODERICK] shall control one-half of the time allotted to the opposition to this bill.

Mr. HENDERSON. That is satisfactory. Let the arrangement then be that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] shall control one-quarter of the time, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BRODERICK] another quarter of the time, and I the remaining half.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Chairman, it is true, as suggested by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], that there are three views in respect to bankruptcy legislation, still there are really but two sides. On one side are those who are in favor of a bankrupt law as contemplated by the Constitution, and on the other are those who are opposed to such legislation. There are, however, three lines of thought in respect to it. First come those who favor a law providing for both voluntary and involuntary bankruptcy. This view is represented by the bill which is now under consideration. There is another school who believe in a law which provides only for voluntary bankruptcy, cutting off all right on the part of the creditor to move in bankruptcy proceedings and giving that right only to the debtor. That school of thought is represented by the substitute, notice of which has been given by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY]. There is still a third class, namely, those who are opposed to any bankruptcy law and are in favor of remitting all remedies of creditors against debtors to the State laws, cutting off entirely all proceedings in the Federal courts under a general bankruptcy law. These are the three schools.

VOLUNTARY AND INVOLUNTARY BANKRUPTCY.

I will consider first the merits of a voluntary and involuntary law, which is the bill reported by the majority of the Committee on the Judiciary. This is unquestionably the kind of a bankrupt law contemplated by the Constitution. In the debates at the great convention at Philadelphia which adopted the Constitution I can find, after careful examination, no objection from any quarter against clothing Congress with that power. I go a step further. In the course of my investigation I have been unable to find that in any State legislature objection was developed on this point when the ratification of the Constitution was made.

Now, I want to impress this point upon the minds of the committee: The Constitution clothed Congress with the power, and I take it that that puts an obligation upon us. It imposes a trust upon us to exercise that power. My theory of that part of the Constitution which gives Congress the power to pass the general bankruptcy law is that Congress is thereby obligated to act upon that power. It is a trust reposed in this body. No bankruptcy law containing only voluntary provisions has ever been placed upon the Federal statute books, showing that Congress thus far has interpreted the Constitution in accordance with my interpretation.

Now a few thoughts in respect to the voluntary and involuntary law. Why should the creditor be cut off from proceeding under the provisions of a bankrupt law? Why should the debtor only be permitted to move in the bankruptcy court for relief in a case where he is a bankrupt? Let us suppose that I am a merchant, and my friend from Kansas, Judge BRODERICK, sells to me $50,000 worth of goods, and I go to work with my industry and my energy to develop a business with that capital plus what I may have accumulated before. I work along for five, or six, or eight, or ten years. In the meantime I am living upon that business. Out of it my wife and my children are deriving their food and clothing. Finally things run on until I find that I can not sustain myself any longer and that my $50,000 worth of borrowed assets have been reduced to $25,000.

Now, at that point, who has the better right to deal with my remaining assets, Judge BRODERICK or Mr. HENDERSON? He is the man who put that property into my possession. I have lived upon it, or upon the credit of it, all that time, but in the struggle of life—perhaps owing to hard times, possibly because I have not the genius to handle the business, but am better adapted to sawing wood—no matter what the reason may be, the fact is that I have but $25,000 worth of assets left. I have lived five or six years off the property which I bought from Judge BRODERICK, and now I have only $25,000 worth of it remaining. I trust that my friend from Kansas, in his time, will make it clear to this committee that I alone, the debtor, have the right to say what shall be done with respect to those remaining assets for the benefit of my creditor.

I contend, Mr. Chairman, that the man who put that property into my possession and who, in equity, owns every dollar of the $25,000 that is left in my possession has a more sacred right to enter proceedings in the bankruptcy court in the matter than I have. But this bill treats them exactly alike. This bill has the voluntary and the involuntary provision. If I find my load too heavy, if I have satisfied myself that I can not go forward and win, I can file my petition in bankruptcy and ask that the assets be distributed among my creditors and that I be allowed to start anew in the battle of life. But suppose I want to struggle on and on, living as long as I can on the assets remaining, allowing them to run down, perhaps, to $10,000, and suppose Judge BRODERICK sees where this thing is drifting, sees that $25,000 of the amount which he advanced to me is gone, and that I am still going down and down, that those assets which he in equity owns are being depleted still further—I would like to hear some good reason given to this committee why Judge BRODERICK, my creditor, should not be permitted to move in the matter to protect what is left of the property that he gave me credit for.

Now, it should be borne in mind that when he steps in and when other creditors step in, what is left of my assets is equitably distributed among them all, all being treated alike; and under this proposed law, I, the debtor, will have left all the exemptions that my State gives me out of what remains. And then, let it not be forgotten, if I am an honest man, the load is lifted and I can reenter the arena of life, relieved of every debt excepting the few specified as exceptions in this bill, such as taxes; and with the load thus lifted I am allowed to make a fresh start. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that no other view can be taken than that the creditor and the debtor should both have the right to treat of this remaining fund in the hands of the debtor. If either should alone have the right, the creditor has the better right.

VIEWS OF STATESMEN OF THE PAST AND PRESENT.

This view has been taken since the Constitution was adopted by many of the ablest men in this country. I know that this statement is not argument; but I have sometimes found, when I had not myself the time or possibly the ability to investigate complicated questions, it was easier for me to pass judgment if I knew how able men had thought of the matter troubling me. In the first place, "the fathers"—and we are all accustomed to speak of "the fathers"—have pointed the way in the Constitution. In addition to that let me name a few, and only a very few, of the giants of the past who have contended in the House and the Senate and before the country in favor of a law with the voluntary and the involuntary provisions. Mr. Webster spoke with no uncertain sound in behalf of both provisions. Henry Clay made himself immortal as an American with his appeal for a bankruptcy law with both provisions. Madison, the great expounder of the Constitution, stood forth the fearless champion for a law with both these provisions. Thomas Benton was equally outspoken. The most eloquent appeal ever made under the American flag for a bankruptcy law, and with both provisions, came from Mr. Hayne; and the erudite Story, who is revered in every law office as one of the recognized expounders of constitutional law, advocated this kind of a law.

In our more modern times—and I have named but a few of the "fathers" and those who followed them—such a measure has been supported in this House by Judge Ezra B. Taylor, whom we all remember as chairman of the Judiciary Committee, the successor of Mr. Garfield; by Col. William C. Oates, now the governor of Alabama, who voted against the bill in the Fifty-first Congress but introduced and championed it in the Fifty-second and Fifty-third Congresses; by Mr. William L. Wilson, the present Postmaster-General; by General CATCHINGS, Mr. Onthwaite, Mr. McAdoo, Judge Hayes of Iowa, Judge Buchanan of New Jersey, ex-Senator Perkins, now gone; Mr. George E. Adams of Chicago, Mr. Frank of St. Louis, and by some of the strongest men of our own time, including Mr. REED and Governor DINGLEY. And I am glad to say that I have standing by my side to-day in advocacy of this measure one who ranks behind few men in point of intellectual ability—the distinguished gentleman from Texas, Judge CULBERSON.

In addition to that, four great national conventions—two held in this city (I had the honor of being a participant in the first one just about the time I was entering Congress some fourteen years ago), one held in St. Louis, and one in Minneapolis, made up of the representative men of the great commercial and industrial interests of the nation—have advocated a bankruptcy bill, made up of both voluntary and involuntary provisions. The great journals of this country, East and West, North and South, have advocated such a measure. The press of the country generally has advocated it, and I can say that so far as the people of this country have spoken they have, with wonderful unanimity, spoken for a law with both voluntary and involuntary provisions.

Now, another thought in passing. What is the real difference between a voluntary and an involuntary bill? The moment that the adjudication in bankruptcy is made all differences are at an end. If Mr. Smith files an involuntary petition or the creditors file a petition against Mr. Smith, the moment that the bankruptcy court makes the adjudication in bankruptcy that moment all differences cease. The privileges, the rights, and the duties of the debtor are exactly the same from that moment, whether he files the petition or his creditors file it. From that instant of time the rights, the obligations, the duties of the creditors are exactly the same, no matter who petitions. I want that thought kept in the mind of this committee, because with that fact so planted many of the questions that might disturb the views of members will vanish from the mind.

INVOLUNTARY BANKRUPTCY.

Now, a few thoughts as to involuntary bankruptcy. There is a feeling in certain quarters that there is something harsh and cruel about involuntary bankruptcy, and that voluntary bankruptcy is generous and kind. This bill provides for voluntary bankruptcy; but is there anything harsh, cruel, or severe in the involuntary provisions of this bill? I want to say here to the committee that during the life of the bankruptcy law in 1867, under which I practiced constantly until it was repealed, I frequently encountered matters that made me think that it had some provisions which were too severe. I have not forgotten my experience, and the view I sometime took with my partners, especially Judge Shiras, with whom I was associated during my entire practice, that the law had been made up too much from the Eastern standpoint.

Westward the star of empire takes its way—

And perhaps—I do not say that it is so—this bill may have stamped upon it a little too much of the Western idea.

And right here let me give a little history. Within a few years after the repeal of the act of 1867 agitation began for another general bankruptcy law; and Judge Lowell, a clean, able man and a patriot, drafted what was known as the Lowell bill. Many of us in the West thought it was too drastic, too severe, in some of its provisions.

About this time a young lawyer living in St. Louis who had distinguished himself for his ability and great learning touching the bankruptcy laws in this country took an interest in this question, and at once his marked ability was recognized and he was made chairman of three national conventions to consider the question. I refer to Judge Jay L. Torrey, then a resident of St. Louis. I corresponded with him, making some suggestions in reference to the matter, because when he began to take an interest in the inquiry he invited an expression of the sentiments of the people generally throughout the country and criticisms of the measure. My old law partner, Judge Shiras, wrote making many suggestions, and the correspondence and the discussion at the conventions finally resulted in producing several radical changes from the original Lowell bill, changes which met the approval of the best legal talent and judgment of this country from every point of the compass until that bill has had the indorsement of the great and small commercial, industrial, and professional bodies of the land, has been supported by the organ of the Farmers' Alliance, as I am assured, and has had the support on the floor of this House of men from every State in the Union, I am safe in saying.

At the Minneapolis convention, on motion of one of the delegates, the bill was named the "Torrey bill" in honor of this young man. He is now the speaker of the Wyoming legislature, a man of ability, modesty, and character.

But, Mr. Chairman, this bill that was named the Torrey bill has undergone very many changes in the Judiciary Committees of the two Houses. It has been reported here for action several times. It was considered by the Judiciary Committee of the House under Judge Taylor, of Ohio, and under Judge Culberson; and before it was reported from the House at this session of Congress a subcommittee of five of the members of the Judiciary Committee had been spending between four and five weeks upon it, meeting almost daily, and twelve days were spent upon it by the full Committee on the Judiciary, in which time many friendly changes were made. And while it is known as the "Torrey bill," that bill having been the foundation on which this is based, yet the pending bill has stamped upon it the judgment of several committees, and many changes have been made from the original Torrey bill. I can truthfully add that Judge Torrey himself has been swift to favor any needed improvements.

We have had three bankruptcy laws in the United States—the one of 1800, which I think was only on the statute books a year or two and was then repealed; then we had the act of 1841, which was only two or three years on the statute books, and was also repealed; and then came the third and last act, that of March 2, 1867, and, following the example previously set, that was repealed in 1878.

I have heard it contended that the brief life of these various bankruptcy laws should be a warning that there was something inherently wrong in such a system. There is no man so foolish as he who will not treat himself squarely. I have studied this question carefully and have endeavored to learn the reasons for their repeal.

Under the act of 1800, during the lifetime of that act, this country was practically a wilderness; we did not know hardly what a railroad was, and the Federal courts were regarded by the profession and the people as something far away and surrounded by great, dark, hidden mysteries. Transportation was limited, and that court was not easily accessible to the people; and in addition to that, as I find in one report made by Judge Wolverton on the Torrey bill, as it was then known, a few years ago, it is shown that the first act became a theme of partisan contention, and that the real merits of the question were lost sight of in partisan war, and consequently it was repealed. But I can well understand that in those days, when we had but little population and no railroad facilities, the masses of the people, and even the legal profession itself, or the great body of it, unfamiliar with the practice in the Federal courts, it could not hope to be a popular court because of the inconvenience to the people; and the same condition of affairs is applicable to and is true of the law of 1841. This condition is not to be lost sight of when we reach the consideration of the act of 1867. The United States courts and their divisions were even then few and remote from the masses of the people.

But another reason operated against the act of 1867. It was too expensive. The insolvent's assets went largely to officials instead of to the debtors, and by almost common consent it was repealed.

But how is it now? None know better than the members of the Judiciary Committee the growth of the Federal court system in this country. Almost every lawyer now knows something of its practice. It is, at every term of Congress, being brought nearer and nearer to the people of the country. Take it in my own State. I think we had but two places to hold the United States court in Iowa during the life of the act of 1867—perhaps three, Des Moines, Dubuque, my own town, and at Keokuk.

Now we have Keokuk, Mount Pleasant, Des Moines, and Council Bluffs, in the southern district, and in my district we have Dubuque, Cedar Rapids, Fort Dodge, and Sioux City. It has been brought nearer to all the people, is convenient to them, and if there is any one class of members of Congress that we become familiar with in the Judiciary Committee it is those gentlemen who are asking the establishment of new divisions in their States for holding United States courts. And now the tendency of legislation in Congress is to be liberal in that regard. I fought for four years to have my own State divided and provide greater conveniences to the people in that regard before I came to Congress, and I think that is where I got the "bee in my bonnet," for I thought possibly I could do the work better inside than on the outside. I finally succeeded in getting the division made, and that division has been a blessing to our State.

Here let me invite your attention to another fact: Under this bill each county is entitled to a referee district; so that the referees are found in each county under this bill. What does that mean? The referee has all the powers of the judge, except as to hearing the petition in contested cases, the confirmation of a composition, the setting of a confirmation aside, or the granting or revoking of a discharge. These matters must be tried before a judge. But if the judge is absent and no defense is made in an involuntary case either by the debtor or any of his creditors, it may be referred to the referee and he may dismiss the petition or make the adjudication in bankruptcy. He may also act on a voluntary petition when the judge is absent. So that this law lays the great bulk of its transaction at the door of everyone interested, and his local counsel, scattered through the State. It is not dumped into the hopper of a few leading lawyers in the cities and towns where these courts of bankruptcy are held; but under this bill, in addition to the advantages which we now have by the increase of the Federal courts and the new divisions, it gives a referee in each county, where the great bulk of the business under the bankruptcy law can be treated.

Now, passing from that let me say this: The involuntary features are kind, because, instead of having a large number of suits scattered around the country and a large number of counsel, you have it all brought into one suit. It is economy to the debtor and to the creditor who is interested in getting as large a dividend as possible. I want that kept in mind.

Another thing about the involuntary provision. Every creditor knows that with this law upon the statute book there is no use of his dashing in "where angels fear to tread" and attacking the debtor with the numberless State writs and proceedings; no use of his going in to get preferences and advantages over his fellow-creditors, because if he does the other creditors can move and bring it into a common suit and he be compelled to surrender up his preferences and take pro rata with the rest.

Do you observe now that it is kind? Why? If a man is struggling a creditor is not afraid that Tom, Dick, or Harry at some point will dash in ahead of him, or that a few great commercial bodies, organizations, or houses in this country, antagonizing this bill, bodies which have got their traps set in front of every country store, communication with their attorneys, and an attorney hired to stay in their stores to manage them, where they can tap a bell and the writ issues under State law, will be able to drag the man in and get preference—there is no danger of that. Therefore, creditors are willing to consult with a debtor, go over his books, and see whether the man can afford to go on, whether he is able to fight the battle to a successful issue, or whether he had better surrender. There is no temptation under this law for the severity of treatment of the debtor that is found under our present State systems.

The creditors do not need to be alarmed. They can take time. If I am a creditor merchant, John Jones, in that other town, can not get ahead of me, for if he tries it we will have it all into a common pot and his attempted preference will have to come in and be divided. Therefore there is no temptation for the harsh treatment of the debtor, no reason why such writs should be issued, attachment, replevin, and so on, or suits be brought. We can take our time, and under that many a man who under our State laws is sent to the wall might be saved and continue successfully the battle of life.

Now, while on this head I will invite the attention of the committee to section 2 of the bill, while discussing the involuntary features alone.

There are nine grounds upon which a debtor may be proceeded against in bankruptcy. Briefly I will allude to each of them for the benefit of those who are sensitive about involuntary proceedings and frequently rack their brains to find hard terms to apply to them when there is no good reason for doing so. I see no cause in this debate for anything but an earnest consideration of this question with a view to doing our whole duty and what is best.

These nine grounds are what must be attacked if the involuntary features of this bill should be surrendered and the right to proceed in bankruptcy is left wholly to the debtor.

Now, I caution you to watch one thing well while I discuss these nine grounds for involuntary proceedings, and that is either one of two conditions must exist before a creditor can move by involuntary proceedings. We have changed these grounds not a little from what they have ever been before when submitted to Congress. There must be either some wicked purpose in the debtor's heart or he must be insolvent in fact and have made protracted defaults in payments due or shown his inability to protect his estate from an inequitable division. Simply being insolvent will not justify proceedings. Making defaults alone will not authorize creditors to proceed. Now, keep those two thoughts in your mind.

The first ground is this:

Acts of bankruptcy by a person shall consist of his having (1) concealed himself, departed or remained away from his place of business, residence, or domicile, with intent to avoid the service of civil process and to defeat his creditors, and shall not have returned at least forty-eight hours before the filing of a petition in bankruptcy, and before the rights of creditors shall have been impaired, altered, or interfered with.

Now, right here let me call your attention to the dictionary in the first section, page 8, clause 12 of the bill, because the definition of the word "defeat" is there given.

"Defeat" shall include defraud or delay, evade, hinder, and impede with intent to defraud.

So that whenever you find in this bill the word "defeat" qualifying an act, it means that he shall try to defeat with a fraudulent purpose and intent. Therefore, keep the dictionary definition of "defeat" in your mind.

Mr. TAWNEY. Who, in the first instance, is to determine that fact for the creditor before he can file a petition in bankruptcy?

Mr. HENDERSON. He will have to look into that, certainly. That is one of the things he has got to determine.

Mr. DE WITT. He has got to allege that fact.

Mr. HENDERSON. Of course; and the burden of proof is on him, too.

Mr. MILES. That is to be proved like any other fact.

Mr. HENDERSON. Yes. Now watch the second ground:

Failed for thirty days and until a petition is filed while insolvent—

Mark the word "insolvent"— to secure the release of any property levied upon under process of law for $500 or over, or if such property is to be sold within such time under such process then until three days before the time fixed for such sale.

You will find that all through this bill. We even give the sinner a chance to repent and come back into the domain of good people and to stay the proceedings that the creditors must and should institute for self-protection.

Now, you see a party must be insolvent. And I want you to watch the condition we made. Three days of grace are given.

The third is:

Made a transfer of any of his property with intent—

What?—

to defeat—

With a fraudulent purpose. Are gentleman going to stand up here and defend scoundrels who defraud their creditors? Gentlemen of the committee, trace this law, chapter by chapter, paragraph by paragraph, and line by line; and when you read it through you will find it is a bill to provide remedies and protection for honest men, but not for thieves and scoundrels. [Applause.] We make no pretense here to hold back the moving creditor to secure his rights against the scoundrel who is trying to defraud him. If anyone here does not agree with that, let him trace through the field of thought and find an argument to satisfy earnest men why you should step in in such a case.

Made a transfer of any of his property with intent to defeat his creditors, and has not regained the ownership and possession of such property—

Here we make an amendment in this bill. Right here I will tell you that one of the things that led me to acquiesce in this, going possibly a little too far, was the counsel of my honored friend who sits in front of me [Mr. DINGLEY] when I entered upon the consideration of this question. He asked me, so far as I could, to tone down these provisions; and when my able colleague, the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY], offered these amendments I acquiesced in them—and has not regained the ownership and possession of such property before the rights of creditors have been altered, impaired, or changed by reason of such transfer, and at least ten days before the commencement of a proceeding in bankruptcy.

Mercy again on guard, even for one acting with a bad motive.

Fourth—

Made an assignment for the benefit of his creditors or filed in court a written statement admitting his inability to pay his debts.

When a man says, "I surrender; I can not any longer keep up this fight," surely his creditor—not a cutthroat, or scoundrel, or harsh, or cruel—his creditor is justified in saying, "I want now to protect my rights and have a fair distribution between man and man." No one will question the wisdom of a law that provides for fair distribution when a debtor gives up the fight and surrenders his property to creditors.

Fifth—

Made while insolvent—

Mark that qualification—

a transfer of any of his property, or suffered any of it to be taken or levied upon by process of law or otherwise for the purpose of giving a preference.

The wicked element is lodged in this: If he is going to give some pet creditor or relative a preference and become bad, it is an act of bankruptcy, and the creditors have a right to step in and the right to act.

Mr. MILES. And that, too, while he is insolvent.

Mr. HENDERSON. And that, too, while he is insolvent. That is explicitly stated; and there, too, we give him time to repent. Observe what follows:

And has not regained the ownership of such property or released same from such levy before the rights of creditors shall have been altered, changed, or impaired by reason of such transfer, taking, or levy, and at least ten days before the commencement of a proceeding in bankruptcy.

The only thing that I feared in this debate was that some one would say, "You have bent too far over to protect a man who did this wicked act." But we concluded that if he repented of his bad purpose, if he desired to reenter the domain of good people, retrace his steps, and put himself and property back where he and it were, we would not allow the creditor to proceed against him.

Sixth—

Procured or suffered a judgment to be entered against him with intent to, defeat—

I have explained "defeat" to you as containing the element of fraud. With an intent to defeat, to fraudulently defeat—his creditors and suffered to remain unpaid until ten days before the filing of a petition in bankruptcy: Provided, That a payment or satisfaction of such judgment by a sale of any of the debtor's property or from the proceeds of such a sale shall not be deemed a payment of such judgment under the provisions of this section.

Seventh—

Secreted any of his property—

The bad element again—hiding, sneaking, retiring from the open field of honest business, defrauding.

Secreted any of his property to avoid its being levied upon under legal process against himself and to defeat his creditors, and has not surrendered such property to such legal process at least ten days before the filing of a bill in bankruptcy.

Eighth:

Suffered while insolvent an execution of $500 or over, or a number of executions aggregating such amount, against him to be returned no property found, unless the amount shown to be due by such execution shall be paid before a petition is filed.

There mercy again comes in.

Surely if the debtor's status is such that the sheriff can find no property and the debtor has given up the battle and permits judgment to be rendered against him, the creditors are wholly justified in moving in bankruptcy, if they see anything in the situation to encourage them in so doing.

Ninth, and last—now watch this, for here is where the battle is often waged against a bankrupt law:

Suspended and not resumed for thirty days, and until a petition is filed, while insolvent, the payment of his commercial paper for or aggregating $500 or over.

Under the act of 1867 the suspension of one's commercial paper for a second of time, fraudulently, was an act of bankruptcy. The suspension of the payment of a man's commercial paper for fourteen days, without reference to fraud, was an act of bankruptcy under the act of 1867, and that without any qualification, without any reference to whether he was solvent or insolvent. The man might be worth a million dollars more than his liabilities, but if his commercial paper for any amount went unpaid for fourteen days he could be thrown into bankruptcy under the act of 1867.

Mr. MILES. Is not that so under many of the insolvent laws of the States?

Mr. HENDERSON. Undoubtedly. In this bill we make the time thirty days, the amount $500 or over, and in addition to that he must be in fact insolvent, and the creditor must prove these facts.

Mr. Chairman, if a man, and especially a merchant or trader—an active business man—fails for thirty days to meet his commercial paper for such an amount, and is unable to have the same renewed, and if he is in fact insolvent, we know by experience that his case is hopeless, and that all interests—his and his creditors'—will be best served by the surrender of his assets to his creditors.

Now, gentlemen, I have gone over the nine grounds for involuntary bankruptcy. If I have not thought, read, and studied this subject in vain and helped to put the bill in its present shape, I say to you you will need "the tongue of Greeks and Jews, and nobler speech than angels use," to satisfy the business men and the honest men of this country that these are harsh and unjust provisions. Under either of the conditions enumerated in these nine heads the creditor is permitted to do—what? To ask that the assets shall be put into a common fund and divided pro rata between creditors of equal rights. That there shall be no advantage to the swift, the cruel, the heartless creditor, but fair treatment to all; and then, if the man is honest and makes no false statements, the load of debt is to be lifted from him and he can start again. If I can not recommend those provisions as fair and just to my associates in this House, then I am incapable of analyzing what is fair play between man and man in the business transactions of life.

Now I call attention to another fact: The creditor can not move by involuntary proceedings unless the debtor owes a thousand dollars. No proposition that has ever heretofore come before Congress made the amount more than $500, and I believe it was $250 or $300 under the act of 1867. If I am wrong I shall be glad to be corrected. But in this bill we make it a thousand dollars, and then, under the voluntary provisions, all limitation is taken off, so that the poorest man in this country who is entitled to a discharge can secure one under the voluntary provision, without regard to how much or how little he owes. Not only that, but we take this step further. If he shows by affidavit that he is unable to pay the filing fees due to the receiver, the trustee, and the clerk, making in all $25, he will be exempt from that requirement, and can go in and secure his rights under the law.

There is one thing that I will answer for in the future if this bill shall become a law. No one can sustain the charge against me or my associates reporting this bill that we have reported a measure against the interests of the poor.

But, Mr. Chairman, I see from my notes—for I have been talking entirely from notes—that they would occupy me for hours, and I must change my line and treat of matters as they come to my mind.

Another point is that a man who is engaged chiefly in farming can not be proceeded against under this bill, and the wage earner is exempted from the involuntary provision. I offered this amendment myself in the committee. In this we may be drifting a little westward, but I have my own reasons and my own feelings about this point. In the first place, the debts which the farmer owes are usually secured by mortgage. He borrows money by mortgage, and finally pays it off and runs without it. The creditors, being secured, do not need to have the farmers covered by this bill, and if they were in it that feature would be made a pretext and a football for those who do not wish to treat this matter candidly—I hope we shall find none such in this Chamber—without being any real advantage.

In our dictionary here we define what "wage earner" is. A "wage earner" is one who does not earn to exceed $1,500 a year. In examining the existing definitions in the law books we found that there might be some difficulty, and we did not wish to leave the matter in doubt, so we made this definition, and we make a wage earner who earns not to exceed $1,500 a year exempt from the involuntary provisions of the bill. Of course he may go into bankruptcy voluntarily, but he can not be thrown in by creditors. I am afraid that if we have committed any error we have leaned too much to the kindly side in this matter, but, Governor [addressing Mr. DINGLEY], you must bear a large part of the responsibility, for you put some of these things into our heads with your valuable and kind suggestions.

We also exempt national banks from the involuntary provision. Now, that looks like bending the supple hinges of the knee to the corporations, but it is not. We would hit them in an instant if it was thought best, but no law can be framed for the national banks better than the law which is now in existence, and inasmuch as these banks have relation to the money of the people and the Government is responsible to the people for the condition of the money, we felt that it was better to leave them to be dealt with by the existing national-bank law. But under this bill no corporation can voluntarily take the benefit of the bankrupt law. If creditors desire to proceed against a corporation in bankruptcy they may do so except in the case of a national bank, while, as I have said, no corporation can voluntarily take advantage of the law.

Mr. DINGLEY. As to the national banks, they are cared for by another law that is more drastic than this.

Mr. HENDERSON. Certainly; more drastic—more severe—than anything in this bill.

I have treated of voluntary and involuntary bankruptcy, and of involuntary bankruptcy alone, and now I want to say a word about

VOLUNTARY BANKRUPTCY ONLY.

My friend from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] has a substitute which he proposes to offer for this bill. I have in my discussion of the involuntary reached over somewhat into the domain of the voluntary, and, inasmuch as his substitute is to be discussed, we will leave the minute discussion of that phase of the question until we hear the argument which he has to offer. The onus probandi, I take it, is upon those who urge that as a substitute for this bill.

But I ask that the fact be kept in mind that the committee's bill provides generously for voluntary bankruptcy. We are as faithful in looking after the interests of the debtor as of the creditor, and, through both, of the public, for the public good is the foundation stone of this whole question.

THOSE OPPOSED TO ANY BANKRUPTCY LAW.

Now, there is a third class—those who are opposed to any bankruptcy law. I know that I have the reputation of being too kind. It has operated against me sometimes, I think; it has been assumed that I was not suitable for responsible position because I am "too good-natured." I am willing to confess that is one of the elements of my nature; and if the charge is true I would not exchange it for a heart of steel—not for a kingdom; because I enjoy life as I go along. But if I can not sustain some kind of a bankrupt law, I think I shall have to lay it to a defective judgment—not to an overabundant heart.

We are living in an age in which I think we are fortunate to live. I have sometimes felt as if we were in great good luck in having our lot cast in this century. While the world's embryonic state was full of interest and development, full of daring men and great chiefs, of courage, mental and physical, I sometimes feel as though in our age the guiding hand had opened the floodgates of light and let it come upon us like a great ocean. I can not counsel a retention of the influence of the Dark Ages. I bless my God that there was a Charles Dickens to wield the mighty pen that opened the doors of the jails of England to let the debtors free. I can not afford to give counsel that will send this country backward. In China the debtor involved to a certain amount is decapitated. I am not with China. I retain upon my library shelves the writings of Dickens, who, with his warm heart and burning genius, dissolved the iron gates that held the debtor a prisoner. The spirit of this age cries out to every lawmaker in favor of a class who are absolutely unfortunate.

Why, my fellow-legislators, this country has seen crash after crash, when the business giants went down before the storm of disaster. Sometimes there was one set of causes; sometimes there was another. It is not for us to discuss now the causes. Let us not turn partisan, and sink this debate below the great dignity that belongs to it. This is no partisan question; it is purely a business matter. In every debate on this question for years there have been found side by side Republicans and Democrats in favor of a bankrupt law, and side by side Republicans and Democrats against a bankrupt law. So let the battle continue—a battle of earnest thought—without belittling it with any partisan considerations. If this bill becomes a law and blesses our people, as I believe it will, it will be no Republican victory; the victory will belong to every man that steps forth to help to do this great good for his country.

In the terrible crash of 1893 and 1894 some of the best men in this country—best in all that is intellectual and moral—went down before the storm. No matter where the whirlwind came from or what hand set it in motion. When the debtor is down, are we going to gain anything as a country by keeping him there? Do we gain anything by holding in chains possible and known activity, vigor, and courage? I do not believe in the jail any further than necessary for the good of society; that is, to tie up the man whose hand would be at your throat or in your pocketbook, not to tie up and chain down honest men with their possible powers and great results locked up in their brains and hearts.

In order to judge intelligently whether a bankruptcy law is needed, let us look at a few facts, for you know Burns said that these were "chiefs that wanna ding," and Burns, drunk or sober, used to get off some good things.

From the Bureau of Statistics I gather that the total failures in the United States from 1879 to 1895, both years included—a term of seventeen years, commencing, as will be observed, with the first year after the repeal of the last bankruptcy act, the act of 1867—the total failures in the United States during that period were 171,889. What an army to have followed Washington! The tea question would have been solved in lively fashion if he had had that body behind him promptly. The aggregate liabilities of these men were $2,611,521,704.

Then I compared the first three months of 1895 with the same three months of 1896.

I found that in three months of 1896 the failures were 4,031, and in the three months of 1895, 3,802. The increase of failures in the first three months of this year, as compared with the corresponding period of last year, was, as will be seen, 229, showing that, although the crisis occurred in 1893 and 1894, the conditions are still unfavorable. What do these liabilities amount to? For the first three months of 1896, $38,755,015; for the first three months of 1895, $34,160,952, the increase for the first three months of 1896, as compared with the corresponding period of 1895, being $4,594,063. So that a bankruptcy law is not alone needed for the crisis, but in a great country like ours there is a continuing condition that needs this remedy; and when I show you that in seventeen years $2,611,521,704 of liabilities have fallen upon an army of 171,889, is it not time for the lawmaker to ask whether it would not be well to lift this load and let such of these prisoners as are honest go free? If the creditor is willing to do it, we should be, and creditors and debtors urge this legislation.

Now, there is a fact here that must not be forgotten. To lift this load, to set this army of debtors free and let them come back among us as active workers and useful members of society, Congress alone has the power. The State can not do it. The State, I grant, is potential, excepting where limited by the Constitution. But the Constitution, Article I, section 10, provides that "no State shall pass any law impairing the obligations of contracts." Therefore the State can not invalidate the contract between the debtor and the creditor where they reside in different States; it can not open the prison doors; it can not put this great, stricken army once more into the field relieved from their parole, but Congress, having the power to pass a general bankruptcy law, containing the full power to annul contracts—for we have it specially granted—we alone have the power to relieve the burden which rests upon the individual. Mr. Chairman, that argument alone should bring us promptly forward to the support of a general bankruptcy bill.

But I find I am consuming a great deal more time with these details than I had expected, and I am running over the usual time.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Iowa have time to conclude his remarks.

Mr. HENDERSON. I thank the gentleman from Texas. I have the control of the time on this side, and that is the reason I do not want to trespass upon the indulgence of the House, because so many of our brethren want to talk. I shall endeavor to make my remarks as brief as possible.

Mr. NORTHWAY. You want to take sufficient time to explain the bill.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I ought to have called attention to the fact, in passing, that the average failures for the fifteen years I have referred to—and I will only give it in round numbers—is one hundred and fifty-three million for every year; and at the rate we are now going on in 1896 it will amount to more than that—to over $155,000,000 annually. I mention this because that condition appeals eloquently to the judgment of the lawmakers for the necessity of some law on the statute books in reference to this subject.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this suggestion or thought I call to the attention of the committee. I have discussed why all of the other bills were short lived, and I want to suggest here that now we have reached the period of great growth in this country, which may be understood by these figures: Taking the first period, for instance, in 1800, after the first act was passed, we had but 5,000,000 of population, while now we have 70,000,000; of telegraph lines, in 1867, when the last bill was passed, we had but 46,000 miles, while in 1894, we had 190,000 miles. Telegrams sent in 1867, 5,000,000; in 1894, 58,000,000. Exports of merchandise in 1845, right after the first act of 1841, $106,000,000; in 1867, $294,000,000, when the last act was passed; and in 1894, $892,000,000. Of imports of merchandise in 1845 we had $113,000,000; in 1867, $395,000,000; and in 1895, $731,000,000. The revenues of the Post-Office Department in 1847 amounted to the sum of $3,000,000 in round numbers, and in 1895 they had reached $76,000,000; while our railroad mileage in this country (you remember I discussed the facilities of getting to the Federal courts in 1841), when the first law was passed, amounted to 3,535 miles; in 1867, to 39,250 miles; and in 1894 this had grown to 179,279 miles.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, the experience of a child will not do to test what is best for the full-grown man. The condition of affairs in this country which you are looking back to when this act was first tested—and that thought will even measure the conditions of 1867—showed this country to be but a mere striping as compared with the great, throbbing commercial nation now, where on every hand the great engines of industry are plowing the way to future greatness and success. Who would look back at those times when we tried that law and declare that that should be the standard by which to measure our judgment upon it now?

England in 1543 first passed a general bankruptcy law. They have never taken that law from the statute book. But what have they done? They have passed over 200 enactments since that time amending the original bankruptcy law. So I appeal to you, gentlemen, to join in framing a bill where we have done our best, consulting the experiences of the past, to learn the objections to the practical operations of the old law, and frame it now in the best possible shape for present conditions; and then let our experience in the future enable us to amend and adjust it to our growing national necessities.

STATE LAWS.

Leaving it under the State law, with the obligations upon the debtor, what is the effect? Does it tend to develop a healthy growth of good, sound commercial relations? The man who is left with hopeless debt hanging over him, what does he do? He must put his property into other hands—in his wife's name or in the name of some relative or friend. I do not care what your State law is, that will be the result. The man who has God's imprint on his soul will do something to sustain his wife and child and save them from want. I believe I would steal a potato if such a condition of affairs were forced upon me, and if you keep this chain around the debtor's neck you drive him, in order to meet these duties of life, the affections that cling round his heart and his hearthstone—you force him into dishonorable courses. When the time has come, when he is forced to the wall, he can not get through. It is a great deal better for the commercial and industrial world, for the creditor, for the debtor, for the people at large, to provide for him a system of relief under our Constitution and under our laws, and divide what he has left among those to whom it belongs, give him the benefit of the exemption laws of his State, and let him start again; but let him start side by side with his fellow-man like a man, and not run from his creditor as the thief runs from the sheriff or the constable.

I tell you that that kind of legislation which brings out the manhood of the people, which offers a premium upon honesty and encourages the brave heart, you need never be afraid of. That kind of legislation which encourages the sneak, and the fellow who would cover up, and lie, and go through life like a craven, is a dangerous class to follow. Let us leave the Dark Ages behind. Let China decapitate if she will, but let us join in the march of those who are in sympathy with the civilization of this age and the enlightened tendencies of a true humanity!

I for one am in favor of taking off the load from this great army of unfortunate men. I speak only of the honest men, and they are the great mass. I pity the lawmaker or philosopher who treats mankind from the standpoint of believing that the majority are knaves. That is an unjust criticism upon the Creator, and my experience is that the generous impulse and the noble sentiment dominate mankind, and it is the small exception that belongs to the knavish, crawling, thievish class.

I say, lift the load and let the defeated get away from their Bull Run and fight like brave men for their Appomattox. It is a great deal better for all of us.

CHANGES IN THIS BILL FROM FORMER LAWS.

Now let me call your attention to some changes in this bill from former laws, because I want, as I go along, to have the bill understood. I am only naming some of the leading changes.

We have made many changes in almost every section from the original Torrey bill. I do not say we alone, but refer to the other committees that have treated it, and to ripe suggestions made by Judge Torrey himself.

For instance, operatives, clerks, and servants, under the act of 1867, were allowed a fifty-dollar exemption. Under this law we exempt $300.

Under the law of 1867 you might move to put a man into involuntary bankruptcy where he owed $300. I thought it was $250, but I find by referring to my notes that it was $300. Under this bill the debtor must be owing $1,000.

I have explained to you about the suspension of commercial paper, the difference between the act of 1867 and this bill. I treated of that before, because, as I saw the hands of the clock moving along, I took things as they occurred to me.

Under the act of 1867, in order that a voluntary bankruptcy bill might be filed, the party had to owe $300. Under this bill we make no limitations. Any man can move.

The costs and fees are cut to a minimum in this bill. My colleague, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURTON], will go into this matter in detail, and when he does I promise you that he will demonstrate what I say in brief, that under the provisions of this bill the hideous, the expensive, features of the act of 1867, which more than anything else drove it from the statute books, because so much went into the pockets of officers—those features have been swept away, and under this bill everything is done at a minimum of expense. I make the general statement. My colleague from Missouri [Mr. BURTON] will demonstrate it. That is one of the leading differences between the two bills.

Under the act of 1867 the title to the property of a debtor passed to the assignee as of the date of the filing of the petition. Under that law it might be many months, or even over a year, before an adjudication could finally be had; and people dealing with the man attacked in bankruptcy did not know, if they bought anything, whether they were getting good title or not. I speak of people dealing in perfect good faith with the alleged bankrupt, the man against whom a petition had been filed. The purchaser bought at his own risk. That had a tendency to destroy the business which he was still conducting.

Now, we have aimed to radically change that in this bill; and I want those who distinctively represent, perhaps, the creditor class to follow this distinction.

Under this bill the title passes as of the date of the adjudication and not as of the date of the filing of the petition. So that the alleged bankrupt doing business in his store or wherever his business is can buy and sell and give perfect title under this bill up to the date that he is adjudicated a bankrupt, and the citizens at large can deal with him with confidence and safety.

Now, some of my friends may say, "That is a bad thing, Brother HENDERSON; you have gone too far. This fellow will let his stock run down. He will stick the proceeds into his pantaloons pocket, and by the time the adjudication is ordered this stock will be run down very badly."

Well, we are not quite as thoughtless as we seem to be under this promising statement, because we have another provision in the bill whereby, if the creditor sees that that condition of things is going on, and the debtor is taking advantage of the situation, the creditor can first file an affidavit alleging the commission of one or more acts of bankruptcy; second, give bond to indemnify the alleged bankrupt if the creditor's allegations do not turn out to be true, and then the court issues a warrant to the marshal, and he takes possession of the property. That stops the depletion of the stock.

But we do not stop there. We provide that even then, if the debtor, acting in good faith and as an honest man, knows he has not committed an act of bankruptcy and wants to keep on conducting business or promoting enterprises he can file a forthcoming bond, a delivery bond, in court and have the stock of goods returned into his possession, and he can go on with his business or enterprise. Then both debtor and creditor are safe. But we believe that he should not be treated as a bankrupt until it is proved that he is in fact a bankrupt. And we have so framed our bill that if he attempts to act the rogue we can stop his business, and in addition to that, if he acts dishonestly he can not get his discharge. This latter fact will tend to keep him in the straight and narrow way, the way of honest dealing.

So that we stand threatening him with taking the position—having first given bonds ourselves—that we will prevent him from getting rid of his debt by securing a discharge from the bankruptcy court. It seems to me this is a wise provision. It is a radical change, but intended to secure justice and fair play between man and man, and makes it absolutely safe for the public, acting in good faith, to deal with the alleged bankrupt.

Another change we have made which I have discussed. That was one about the referee. I have referred to the referees of the district being in each county, showing liberality in accommodation to the people.

Under the old law arbitration was provided for in addition to the bankruptcy proceedings. Under this bill we have what is called "composition." A majority in number of creditors and amount of claims in value may do what? Recommend a "composition" to the court. That does not effectuate a composition. Some of us at one time thought that we should make that absolute, so that the court would have nothing to say about it; but the view finally prevailed that we should only carry the composition before the judge, who might ratify or disapprove it. Why?

Because we did not feel that a majority, a bare majority—which might be a majority of one creditor or a majority of one dollar—should absolutely dictate the dismissal of the case because A or B might have been bought up or some secret work might have been indulged in. Besides, we want the alleged bankrupt first examined, so that his creditors might know his real status before voting on the proposed composition.

Mr. HOWE. Why not leave it to two-thirds?

Mr. HENDERSON. You might just as well say, "Why not leave it to seven-eighths or nine-tenths?" A majority seems to be the rule of life in such matters. The only intent of this was to get an absolute settlement.

Mr. HOWE. Why not make it two-thirds, so as to have a final settlement, as it would save a great deal of the expense, and there would be no danger about the size of the majority?

Mr. HENDERSON. Now, that is a very proper question, and one that occupied much thought and discussion; but if the whole transaction is honest the judge has but one motive, and that is to do what is for the best interests of the creditors. If the majority recommend a composition and the minority do not come in and prove that there has been some foul play, the composition will unquestionably be granted, and will result in a dismissal of the case. And we have further protection by providing that if within six months after the adjudication has been made it is shown that fraud was perpetrated, the composition can be reopened and the matter shall be passed upon by the court.

Mr. NORTHWAY. That is provided for in the act of 1867.

Mr. HENDERSON. It was arbitration and not composition that was provided for in the act of 1867.

Now, in addition to that, we have arbitration and we have compromises. We can arbitrate differences; and there is a provision whereby the trustee can appoint one arbitrator, the other party in the controversy one arbitrator, and these two the third; and if they can not agree on the third, the judge shall appoint the third, and thus settle many differences. So we have a compromise of the question in the court. The bill is framed to expedite the closing up of the estate at the earliest possible moment. The application can be filed for discharge in bankruptcy after the expiration of two months, and within the next four months, and conditionally within the next six months, but not afterwards, and a reasonable notice will be given to the creditors of the filing of such application. The court will fix the time when the application will be heard and the application refused or the discharge granted.

Now as to the fees. The clerk gets $10, and only that amount, for all his work until the case is settled and nothing more after settlement. That will effect expedition. The aim of this bill is that everyone who is interested in the matter is interested in the prompt closing of the estate. The clerk gets $10 at the beginning of the case, and if it stays in court for three years or ten years he does not get another cent. He is therefore interested in the settlement and hurries it up. In the case of the fees of the trustee and the referee, one gets $5 and the other $10 when the case is closed, and not until then; and when the final dividends are paid, each gets his commission, as will be explained by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURTON]. All of it is to be done after it is closed, not keeping the estate open until the assets are eaten up, swallowing the dividends that belong to the creditors.

Under the act of 1867 as amended the discharge was not granted a debtor unless he paid 50 per cent, unless a majority consented in recommending it. Here no consent is needed. No per cent is required. If a man is honest, and has a clean record, he has no trouble. But, gentlemen, if he is crooked, if he is dishonest, if he has been doing a dishonest business, he will find no relief in this bill from one end of it to the other. I am going to be perfectly square with you about that. I will recommend no bill to this body that is made for the purpose of shielding and protecting scoundrels. I will join hands with all of you to lift the unfortunate and give him a chance to start again.

The last bankruptcy bill that we had—the act of 1867—reached back for six months. This bill only goes back four months. That is another distinction in favor of the debtor.

NO IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT.

I saw it stated in a New York paper the other day—it was thought fully brought to my attention by some member—that the old law used to imprison for debt, and uneasiness was expressed as to whether this bill did so. It does not. Nowhere does it provide imprisonment for debt. The only parts of the bill that could even suggest such an idea are these: Under section 8, if a man is about to run away and a showing is made to the court by affidavit that his absence will defeat the operation of the law, the court may in such case do what any court may do and ought to do, it may issue a warrant for his arrest, just as if a man is going to jump bail or escape so that justice can not be carried out. A warrant may issue for his arrest, but he can not even then be put in jail under the bill; he can only be held until he gives bail. There is no imprisonment for debt.

Under section 17, paragraph 13, where parties refused to obey or to carry out the orders of the court in the operations of the bill fine and imprisonment may be inflicted. For instance, suppose the court orders the bankrupt in to be examined upon matters about which he may be properly examined and he refuses. In such a case he may be fined and imprisoned, not because he has not paid his debts, but because he has disobeyed the order of the court. The fine and imprisonment are in the nature of punishment for contempt. If you strip a court of the power to enforce its mandates when authorized by law to issue them, you destroy the power of that court. That is well understood. But nowhere in this bill, from one end to the other, can be found a single provision bearing out the suggestion that it authorizes imprisonment for debt.

A PLAIN AND CONCISE BILL.

Another thing; this bill is so simple that one who is not a lawyer can understand it. It is plain, condensed, concise. Why, we used to go almost crazy over the old act of 1867, trying to understand and apply its provisions, and the courts went more crazy than anybody else. [Laughter.] The men who have been connected with the framing of this bill, both in Congress and outside of it, have tried to profit by experience and to frame a bankruptcy bill so simple that no court or counsel or business man could fail to understand it. [Applause.]

TRIAL BY JURY.

We provide here for jury trial. Under the old law, if a jury was demanded in writing, the matter had to be set down for trial at the next term of the court, which might be six months or twelve months off; but under this bill we provide that a jury may be summoned at once.

Mr. KERR. I understand the gentleman to say that under the provisions of this bill creditors can force a corporation into involuntary bankruptcy.

Mr. HENDERSON. Yes, sir; except national banks.

Mr. KERR. What is the objection to giving to corporations the right to go into voluntary bankruptcy?

Mr. HENDERSON. The real objection is this: A corporation is made up of stockholders, and the corporation may fail, and it may be difficult to catch the stockholders and hold them for their individual liabilities. They may own stock in a corporation and may be rich and well able to handle the obligations of the corporation, and yet may escape themselves, while the institution takes advantage of the act.

Mr. RAY. If my colleague will permit me, there is another good reason for that provision in the bill. It is this: Corporations are always created and have life given to them by the laws of the several States, and the States almost without exception have provided very drastic laws to compel them to pay their debts. For that reason it was thought better to leave them to the operation of the laws of the States which created them.

Mr. KERR. But my question is, Why should they not be permitted to take the benefit of voluntary bankruptcy as well as an individual?

Mr. HENDERSON. I will say to the gentleman that there is another reason. We have given him the substantial reasons. There is another reason, which belongs somewhat to the domain of the demagogue; and we are all more or less tainted that way. [Laughter.] I do not know that it is necessary that I should explain further on that point. A bill that gave the benefit of the voluntary provisions to corporations would be assailed most vigorously on that ground, and as corporations have other remedies, we thought we would not make the bill open to attack in that direction. I will say frankly to the gentleman, further, that on broad legal grounds it is pretty hard to figure out a good substantial reason for the exception, but we decided that on the whole it was best not to give corporations the right to take advantage of the voluntary provisions of the bill. They may be proceeded against in involuntary bankruptcy by creditors in exactly the same way as individuals and firms may be proceeded against.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Section 19 provides for a jury trial. It says (division b):

b If a jury is not in attendance upon the court one may be specially summoned for the trial, or the case may be postponed; or, if the case is pending in one of the district courts within the jurisdiction of a circuit court of the United States, it may be certified for trial to the circuit court sitting at the same place.

I understand that the object of that is to get a speedy trial by jury.

Mr. HENDERSON. Yes.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Well, take my State. It is divided into two districts, and each of those districts is subdivided into two subdivisions. The judge of the northern district resides in the city of Cleveland, and the judge of the southern district resides in the city of Cincinnati. They hold courts in the cities of Toledo and Columbus twice a year. With the exception of the times when they are holding court in those subdivisions they are never in those subdivisions; they are holding court in the cities of Cleveland and Cincinnati. Now, if a man should desire a jury trial in either of those subdivisions he could not get it under this provision of the bill. Now, I want to know why you can not provide in your bill that the referee may preside at a jury trial?

Mr. HENDERSON. Well, we thought it best not to give that great power to the referee. There is a law now authorizing another judge to act when necessary.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. But there may not be another judge.

Mr. HENDERSON. Then we shall have to give you another judicial division.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. I wish you would. These referees are to be appointed by the United States district judges.

Mr. HENDERSON. Of course we can not meet every remote condition.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. If the gentleman will think about it, he will recognize this as a serious matter. Parties desiring a jury trial under this law, but not residing in a district where a judge resides, might not get a jury trial in six months.

Mr. HENDERSON. This appeared to the committee the best that we could do. The parties would have a right to demand a jury trial, and the judge would have authority to go to that place.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. But he might be busy at home and unable to leave.

Mr. HENDERSON. Then some other judge would have to be detailed. Under the existing law it often happens that one judge is detailed to hold court for another.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I should like to ask my friend from Iowa a question. I understood him to state that in the case of every act alleged against the debtor as an act of bankruptcy the bill secures the right to a trial by jury. Does the gentleman claim that the question of the discharge—

Mr. HENDERSON. I was speaking only of the adjudication touching acts of bankruptcy.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I understand that. But what I wish to know is this: Under this bill when an application is made for a discharge, and is traversed by the creditors on the ground of some act on the part of the debtor, can that traverse be tried before a jury?

Mr. HENDERSON. I think not; and it has not been under any bankrupt law, as I remember.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Then it would be tried before a judge.

Mr. HENDERSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. That is the way I understood it.

Mr. HENDERSON. This touches the matter of adjudication. The provision of the bill is:

A person against whom an involuntary petition has been filed shall be entitled to have a trial by jury in respect to any act of bankruptcy alleged in such petition to have been committed, upon filing a written application therefor before the expiration of the time within which an answer may be filed. If such application is not filed within such time a trial by jury shall be deemed to have been waived.

Mr. PARKER. Will the gentleman allow me this suggestion? One reason, as I understand, for omitting corporations from the operation of this bill is that the bill is intended to relieve persons who can not pay their debts, and who can not obtain relief under the State insolvency law. That reason fails to apply in the case of corporations, because when a corporation becomes insolvent it is practically dead, and somebody else succeeds to its assets. So that there could be no advantage in embracing corporations within the operations of the bill.

Mr. HENDERSON. There is something in the gentleman's suggestion. The bill provides that corporations may be proceeded against in involuntary bankruptcy like any other debtor. It would be unwise, I think, to make a distinction between debtors, except as explained.

We all know that originally bankruptcy under the old English law referred simply to traders, the word "bankrupt" meaning by its derivation "bank broken" or "bench broken."

Mr. PARKER. My suggestion was that full relief in the case of corporations is given by existing statutes, and no further relief for them is required in a bankruptcy law.

Mr. HENDERSON. Oh, yes; they have other methods of winding up their business.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. As I understand, this bill makes no provision for trial by jury in the case of voluntary bankruptcy. I suggest to the gentleman that in such cases there may be an issue raised by creditors which ought to be decided by a jury trial.

Mr. HENDERSON. In cases of voluntary bankruptcy, as we understand, the necessity for a jury trial does not arise because the debtor goes into bankruptcy of his own choice; but where his creditors sue him in bankruptcy he ought to have the right to a trial by jury.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. But where the debtor voluntarily goes into bankruptcy a creditor may desire to raise the issue of bankruptcy or no bankruptcy; and in that case should there not be a trial by jury?

Mr. HENDERSON. The case which the gentleman suggests is hardly likely to occur.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. I can imagine many cases of that kind.

Mr. HENDERSON. In very few cases where the debtor himself "throws up the sponge" and says, "I can not continue the fight any longer," will the creditor be found opposing the proceeding. They would rather adopt the view that the sooner they can have a dividend the better, and can have no motive for contesting his being adjudicated a bankrupt.

The filing of the petition would be an act of bankruptcy; if the petition was in due form it seems to me there would be no alternative for the court but to make the adjudication.

Mr. Chairman, I do not want to take up more time. I more than appreciate the kindness of this committee in giving me its attention on what is usually considered a dry theme. I wish only to say that we of the committee have worked conscientiously in this matter. The different members of the committee have worked side by side without any bickerings. There have been no politics in this measure—not a particle. Even those who did not agree with the majority of the committee with reference to the sort of a bill to be presented have shown the greatest thoughtfulness and consideration and have done nothing to impede, but everything to help and expedite, our labors. Whatever there may be in this bill of good, we have brought it in as your committee—as your servants. There is nothing in this bill for us that is not for each member of this House—nothing.

We hope to have your approval and support by the further discussion of the bill. We have the approval of our own judgment and consciences and would like, beyond that, to have your approval and that of the country.

I can say to you that the bill is not framed for the East or the West, for the South or the North, but for the benefit of the whole country. There is nothing sectional whatever in the bill, and I believe that its provisions are in full accord and full sympathy with the great heart beat, conscience, and intelligence of this wonderful century. [Applause.]

I move that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PAYNE reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bankruptcy bill, had come to no resolution thereon.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PICKLER. I desire to offer a resolution, and ask immediate consideration of the same.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read, subject to the right of objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Monday, the 4th day of May next, be set apart for the consideration of the same class of business that is now considered at the Friday evening sessions of the House, and that 100 members shall constitute a quorum in the Committee of the Whole in the consideration of such business at that time; and that hereafter, during the first session of the Fifty-fourth Congress, the House shall, at 5 o'clock p. m. on Fridays, take a recess until 7:30 o'clock p. m., and remain in session from 7:30 p. m. until 11 p. m., and that debate hereafter at the Friday evening sessions of the Fifty-fourth Congress and on said Monday, May 4, shall be limited to ten minutes on each bill, to be equally divided between those favoring and those opposing the same.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I shall have to object unless the gentleman will modify the resolution and make it ten minutes on a side.

Mr. PICKLER. That will be longer than necessary. The whole time of the committee is taken up now at these night sessions by debate, practically.

Mr. LAYTON. I will be compelled to object, unless that modification is made. You can not explain a bill under ten minutes.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. If the resolution is adopted would it not interfere with the present order of business for the consideration of the bankruptcy bill, provided that is not disposed of by Saturday afternoon?

The SPEAKER. It would, if it is extended beyond that time, except under certain circumstances; where the previous question had been ordered, for instance, that would have to be taken instead of this order.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Everybody knows that Saturday afternoon at 4 o'clock it will be difficult to take a vote upon this bill. There are usually but few members here.

Mr. PICKLER. I think it was well understood that we were to have Saturday for the consideration of these private pension bills, and the bankruptcy bill now has displaced us.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, is this a request for unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. BAILEY. I have attended, Mr. Speaker, every Friday night session since I have been a member of Congress, except in cases of sickness, when unavoidably absent, and I do not believe I want to multiply them, in view of the fact that less than one-third of the members are in the habit of attending such sessions.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Texas to object.

Mr. PICKLER. This bankruptcy bill crowded us out of the way. You had better give us this time—

Mr. BAILEY. We are taking no time belonging to your committee. As I understand it, you are asking unanimous consent now that the House shall give you additional time for the consideration of private pension bills.

Mr. PICKLER. The House well understood that we were to have one night or a day for the consideration of these bills when the bankruptcy bill interfered.

Mr. HENDERSON. We gave way, the gentleman should remember, three days last week; so that the gentleman ought not to throw accusations against our committee.

Mr. PICKLER. I am not throwing accusations against the committee, but I understood that we were to have a day, and I supposed we would have Saturday. Now I thought it proper, as we could not get Saturday, that we should have the next day thereafter.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Make it Tuesday next.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Texas to object.

Mr. HENDERSON. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. PICKLER. I ask the reference of the resolution to the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. It will be so referred.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Pending the motion to adjourn, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. DANFORD, for eight days, on account of important business.

To Mr. HENRY of Indiana, indefinitely, on account of important business.

To Mr. STEPHENSON, for ten days, on account of sickness in his family.

The motion of Mr. HENDERSON was then agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

By Mr. COLSON, from the Committee on Pensions: The bill

Mr. PASCO. I submit a written report to accompany the bill, which I ask may be printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report will be printed under the rule.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That 5,000 copies of the hearings on woman's suffrage be printed for the use of the Senate, the cost not to exceed $20.

Mr. HARRIS. Does not the resolution have to go to the Committee on Printing?

Mr. CALL. A similar resolution, a concurrent resolution, has been reported from that committee and passed the Senate. The chairman of the Committee on Printing consents to the resolution.

Mr. HALE. A similar resolution has already passed the Senate. The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

On motion of Mr. PRITCHARD, it was Ordered, That there be printed for the use of the Senate 1,000 copies of the evidence taken in the investigation of the charges preferred against the Public Printer before the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment, and that a like number of the reports of said investigation be printed.

LIENS UPON IMPORTED MERCHANDISE.

Mr. FRYE. Yesterday the bill (H. R. 6936) to amend section 2981 of the Revised Statutes as amended by the act of June 10, 1890, came from the other House and was referred to the Committee on Finance. A Senate bill, the same bill, word for word, has already been reported from the Committee on Commerce and is on the Calendar. I ask that the vote by which the House bill was referred to the Committee on Finance may be reconsidered, and that it be placed on the Calendar in the place of Order of Business 784, and that the Senate bill be indefinitely postponed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Committee on Finance will be discharged from the further consideration of House bill 6936, and it will be placed on the Calendar at the point indicated.

Mr. FRYE. And let the bill (S. 2391) to amend section 2981 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended by the act of June 10, 1890, be indefinitely postponed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. QUAY. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of Senate bill 2522, reported a few moments ago from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. HALE. Let me get up the appropriation bill first.

Mr. QUAY. Very well.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. VILAS. I call the attention of the Senator from Maine to the fact that I gave notice that this morning I should ask the Senate to receive the communication from the governor of Wisconsin presenting the statue of Marquette. I have no objection to calling up the appropriation bill if it is not to interfere with that order.

Mr. HALE. I desire to have the bill taken up, and then, under the arrangement which has been made for addresses upon the subject indicated, I shall not ask to go on with the bill until that is completed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maine, to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7542) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator from Wisconsin defer for a moment until I have yielded, as I agreed, to the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY]?

Mr. VILAS. Certainly.

Mr. QUAY. I have no desire to press the consideration of Senate bill 2522 if the Senator from Wisconsin desires to proceed now. But the bill was reported a few moments ago and I should be glad to have it passed to-day.

Mr. VILAS. I will ask the Senator from Pennsylvania if the consideration of the bill is likely to occupy any time?

Mr. QUAY. If it occasions any debate I will not press its consideration.

Mr. VILAS. Very well.

ALASKA TRANSPORTATION AND TRADING COMPANY.

Mr. QUAY. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 2522) creating a corporation known as the Alaska Transportation and Trading Company, and granting right of way for the construction and operation by that corporation of a turnpike and post-road from Taiya Inlet to Lake Bennett, in the Territory of Alaska.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for information. The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. PERKINS. I ask what committee have reported upon that bill?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I will say, in answer to the inquiry, the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. The purpose is to build over an almost impassable mountain range, where now supplies are carried upon the backs of natives in the snow, a toll road for post-office and post-road purposes. The bill carries with it no sort of appropriation except a right of way and land at the termini. All the expenses of construction are to be borne by the company itself.

There is no way of incorporating a company to do business in Alaska except by Federal statute. Otherwise persons must apply under the laws of the different States and do business in the Territory of Alaska by the company that exists between States and Territories. There have been some gold fields discovered in the section through which this road is intended to extend, and the building of the road will be of great service.

There is another consideration which makes it especially desirable at this time, and that is one I do not care to dwell upon. In view of differences that may arise as to the proper boundary line of Alaska, the construction and possession of this road may be a wise measure.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President—

Mr. PEPPER. I object to the further consideration of the bill.

Mr. PERKINS. The explanation, as far as it goes, is very satisfactory.

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President, I will not press the bill at this time.

Mr. PERKINS. I, however, have introduced one or two bills in Congress, the object in view being to acquire title to sites where people have erected mills and where they have expended hundreds of thousands of dollars in securing a location. Those bills were referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and that committee have been considering them for weeks and months, and they have decided that no recommendation should be made touching the lands of Alaska until after a commission has investigated the question fully under the direction of the governor or judge or some one familiar with that country.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I object to the further consideration of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair desires the attention of the Senator from California for a moment. The Senator from Kansas, the Chair understands, objects to the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. PEPPER. I do.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. HALE. Let us have the regular order.

STATUE OF JAMES MARQUETTE.

Mr. VILAS. Mr. President, I ask that the communication of the governor of Wisconsin which has been laid upon your table be presented to the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the communication from the governor of Wisconsin indicated by the Senator from Wisconsin. The communication will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

EXECUTIVE CHAMBER, Madison, Wis., March 19, 1898.

SIR: It gives me pleasure to inform you, and through you the honorable body over which you preside, that the State of Wisconsin, in response to the invitation extended to the States of the Union under section 1814 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and in accordance with the resolution passed at the first session of Congress in 1893, has placed in the old Hall of the House of Representatives at the Capitol of the United States a marble statue of Père Marquette. This statue was made in pursuance of an act of the legislature of this State passed at its biennial session in 1897, and is the work of the Italian sculptor, Mr. G. Trentanove, of Florence, Italy.

I have the honor, in behalf of the State of Wisconsin, of presenting this statue to the Congress of the United States.

I am, sir, very respectfully, yours,

W. H. UPHAM,
Governor of Wisconsin.

Hon. ADLAI E. STEVENSON,

Vice-President of the United States and President of the Senate, Washington, D. C.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. President, I present resolutions in connection with the same subject and ask for their immediate consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolutions submitted by the Senator from Illinois will be read.

The resolutions were read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the thanks of Congress be given to the people of Wisconsin for the statue of James Marquette, the renowned missionary, explorer, and discoverer of the Mississippi River.

Resolved, That the statue be accepted, to remain in the National Statuary Hall, and that a copy of these resolutions, signed by the presiding officers of the Senate and House of Representatives, be forwarded to his excellency the governor of the State of Wisconsin.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolutions.

Mr. MITCHELL of Wisconsin. Mr. President, the ancient city of Laon, in the north of France, not far from the Belgian border, was the birthplace of Jacques Marquette, the man whom Wisconsin has seen fit to honor. It sits upon a rocky eminence and dominates the vine-covered country of Champagne. Girt about by battlements, with a stately mediaeval cathedral rising in its midst, it forms a citadel and sanctuary in one.

Born into such surroundings, growing up between war and worship, young Marquette was bound to become either a soldier or a priest. He inclined to the latter, but, a hero at the core, it mattered little whether he donned cassock or cuirass. Marquette came of a martial race. His forefathers distinguished themselves in the Continental wars. Three of their descendants fell in our own war for independence. At 17 Marquette joined the followers of Loyola. Among them he spent twelve years in diligent study and in teaching. St. Francis Xavier, "the apostle of the Indies," became his model. He burned with desire for work in pagan lands. Under the authority of his order he sailed for Canada, landing at Quebec on September 20, 1666, buoyant with health and high ambition.

In 1524 Verrazzano, a sailor of fortune (if the expression is permissible), flying the flag of France, skirted the coast of New England and Canada, thereby founding a territorial claim.

In 1535 the French navigator Cartier ascended the St. Lawrence River as far as Mont Royal, the Montreal of to-day.

In the beginning of the seventeenth century came the colonizer Pontgravé; after him the soldier Champlain, with his men at arms and their arquebuses. In a battle at the modern Ticonderoga he gained the questionable friendship of the Algonquins and the unrelenting hatred of the Iroquois. For over a century thereafter the Iroquois left a bloody trail in Canada. Then the French Government sent out to represent it De Tracy, Courcelles, and the vigilant Talon. About this time arrived the Recollects, the "Gray Gowns"; after them the Jesuits, the "Black Gowns."

Up to the time of Marquette's arrival French colonization in the populating sense had proved a failure. Some insignificant settlements along the St. Lawrence, a handful of priests, a few scattering fur traders and bushrangers made up the population. All Canada did not count to exceed 6,000 souls. Despite all these efforts at colonization, Canada still remained a wilderness hardly touched by the hand of civilization save in the matter of gunpowder and the equally destructive brandy. Into this domain of barbarism Marquette betook himself, having for sole protection the cross of Christ. He remained for a while at the mouth of the Saguenay River, ministering to the Montagnais Indians and perfecting himself in their language. Marquette was a gifted linguist, mastering later on six distinct Indian tongues.

In 1668 he was ordered to the Sault Ste. Marie. With a party of Nez Percés he moved up the Ottawa River, crossed Lake Nipissing to Georgian Bay, thence by Lake Huron to the "Sault."

Throughout this perilous passage he stuck to his paddle like a galley slave to his oar, subject meanwhile to the taunts of his brutal companions. The party landed on what is now the American side of the St. Marys River, at a point frequented by the Chippewa Indians. Here he erected the first church in the present State of Michigan. Here he dug and planted the first garden in the Northwest.

In the autumn of 1669 he set out for La Pointe de St. Esprit, in the present State of Wisconsin. This was a mission founded a short time before at the entrance to Chaquamegon Bay and not far from the western extremity of Lake Superior. Here were gathered remnants of the Huron and Ottawa tribes of Indians, who had fled before the fury of the Iroquois.

Marquette writes interesting accounts of the Indians to Le Mercier, superior of the missions:

I am obliged to render you an account of the mission at La Point de St. Esprit among the Ottawas, according to your orders, on my arrival here after a month's navigation on snow and through ice, which closed my way and kept me in constant peril of life.

Divine Providence having destined me to continue this mission, I arrived and went to visit the Indians here, who are divided into five towns. The Hurons, to the number of about four or five hundred, still preserve some little Christianity. The nation of the Outouaks is far from the Kingdom of God, being above all other nations addicted to sacrifices and juggleries. They ridicule prayer and will scarcely hear us speak of Christianity. The Kikakons had resolved in the fall of 1668 to obey God. They were then in the fields harvesting their Indian corn. They listened with pleasure when I told them that I came to La Point for their sake and that of the Hurons, that they never should be abandoned, but be beloved above all other nations.

Winter closed in. For Marquette, what a disheartening sojourn alone on that desolate shore! For him no communion with civilized man, no caress of child, no soothing voice of woman. Even nature offered no consolation. Frost had withered the grass in the openings. The foliage of the trees had put on, by way of leave-taking, its coat of many colors, then dropped to the ground. Only the dormant pines retained their green. They slept like knights of old, with their armor on. Snow fall stilled the hum in the forest. Ice stopped the tinkle of the streams. No sound fell upon his ear save the guttural tones of savages and the swash of the angry waves of Chaquamegon.

From the west came trooping bands of warlike Dakotas, their long locks dangling, bunches of flint-headed arrows slung on their backs, and stone hatchets stuck in their belts. From the south, a thirty days' journey, bent on trade, came the more pacific Illinois.

All these brought stories of the "Great Water"—the Mississippi—flowing no one knew whither; where houses walked on the water and monster fishes swam. The exploration of this river, which he believed had its mouth in California, became a settled purpose in the mind of Marquette. He says:

If the Indians who promise to make me a canoe do not fail to keep their word, we shall go into this river; we shall visit the nations which inhabit it, in order to open the way to so many of our fathers who have long awaited this happiness. This discovery will give us a complete knowledge of the southern or western sea.

Throughout the winter he ministered to his unruly flock, baptizing the infants and instructing the adults. In the pungent smoke of his cabin he pondered over his project of discovery, schooling himself in Indian lore.

The following year the Dakotas, incensed at the conduct of the Hurons and the Ottawas, declared war upon them, "first returning to the missionary the pious pictures which he had sent them as a present." It was resolved to abandon La Pointe. The Ottawas decamped first. Marquette remained with the Hurons to join in their wanderings and privations. They took to their canoes and, mindful of the good fishing at Michilimackinac, they made their way to that "pebbly strand." The Hurons, or Wyandots, came originally from Georgian Bay, whence they fled before the Iroquois. In years gone by, on their passage to Chaquamegon Bay, they had touched at Michilimackinac. On this storm-swept, inhospitable spot, Marquette's first care was the erection of a mission chapel, calling it St. Ignace. He writes to Father Dablon:

The Hurons come regularly to prayers and have listened to the instructions I gave them, consenting to what I required to prevent their disorders and abominable customs. We must have patience with untutored minds, who know only the devil, who like their ancestors have been his slaves, and who often relapse into the sins in which they were nurtured. God alone can fix these fickle minds and place and keep them in His grace, and touch their hearts, while we stammer at their ears.

He ends his letter:

This is all I give about this mission where minds are now more mild, tractable, and better disposed to receive instructions than in any other part. I am ready, however, to leave it in the hands of another missionary to go on your order to seek new nations toward the South Sea who are still unknown to us.

Colbert, in France, and Frontenac, then governor of Canada, were scheming to circumvent the English and "confine them to their weak and broken line along the coast of the Atlantic." Besides, they wanted a more southerly outlet than the St. Lawrence, icebound half the year. The acquisition of the region through which flowed the much talked of but unexplored Mississippi appeared to them important to these ends. For this expedition Frontenac, on the advice of Talon, selected Marquette and Joliet. The latter was a young man, a Canadian by birth, and a trader and rover by inclination.

In December, 1673, Joliet joined Marquette at Michilimackinac. Of Joliet's coming and purpose Marquette writes:

I was delighted at this good news, because I saw my plans about to be accomplished, and found myself in the happy necessity of exposing my life for the salvation of all these tribes, and especially of the Illinois, who, when I was at Point St. Esprit, had begged me very earnestly to bring the word of God among them.

The winter was passed in preparation for the trip. On May 17, 1673, the two Frenchmen and five Indian companions started upon their journey in two canoes, with a small provision of Indian corn and smoked beef—a sorry outfit, but gaily escorted by hope. At first they followed the northern shores of Lake Michigan and entered Grand Baye, or Green Bay. The Indians upon the banks of the Menominee River, where they put in, endeavored to dissuade them from proceeding farther. The banks of the Mississippi, they said, "were inhabited by ferocious tribes, who put every stranger to death, tomahawking all newcomers without cause or provocation." They added that "there was a demon in a certain part of the river whose roar could be heard at a great distance and who would engulf them in the abyss where he dwelt; that the waters were full of frightful monsters who would devour them and their canoes, and, finally, that the heat was so great that they would perish inevitably." Marquette did not take counsel of these fears. The party took the same course that Nicolet had followed some forty years before, up the lower Fox River, crossing Lake Winnebago, then ascending the upper Fox to a portage, and passing over to the Wisconsin River. Here they reached the limit of previous exploration. In this neighborhood they chanced upon a village of Muskoutens, Miamis, and Kickapoos, who directed them as to their course. Marquette gave to the river the name Mesconsin, which was changed to Ouisconsin, and, finally, to Wisconsin.

Down the stream they sped, threading the currents and grating over the sand bars; by forests resplendent with verdure; past nature's fields rich with ungarnished harvests. On the 17th of June, just below the present city of Prairie du Chien, Wis., they shot out upon the virgin waters of the Mississippi. From the prows of their frail canoes came the first ripple in the rising tide of civilization which was to overspread the great West. Marquette surveyed the scene—one that no white man had ever before looked upon—"with a joy he could not find words to express," to use his own language. Southward they steered, landing to cook their food, at night anchoring in the stream for safety. They had journeyed for over a fortnight seeing no sign of human life, when they came across footprints in the mud at the water's edge. Following a path, not without trepidation, they came to a village of the Illinois. Here, when Marquette had addressed them in their own tongue, they were greeted with kindness. After a friendly smoke, Marquette was presented with the mysterious talisman of peace, a "calumet." It is claimed that Marquette in his written narrative introduced this word into civilized speech. A feast followed. A large dog, boiled, was the "pièce de résistance." This did not tempt the travelers and they were allowed to regale themselves on fat buffalo meat. Taking leave of their hosts, they drifted past the Illinois River. Later they reached the mouth of the Missouri, and their canoes were tumbled about in the turbid waters of the confluence. A little time and they espied on their left the Ohio—Iroquois for the "Beautiful River." Day after day passed on in solitude. Nearing the mouth of the Arkansas River, Indians on the banks became threatening and put out in their canoes to the attack. This would certainly have proved fatal to the party but for the calumet which Marquette had received from the Illinois. He held it aloft by way of flag of truce. The natives lowered their weapons and the travelers went on in peace. They landed at an Indian village opposite the mouth of the Arkansas. At this point they decided to turn back. A young warrior who spoke Illinois warned them of the dangers which awaited them lower down the river—death by disease or at the hands of the Indians, or capture by the Spaniards.

They had established the important point that the Mississippi did not flow into the Atlantic or Sea of Virginia, nor into the Gulf of California or Vermilion Sea, but into the Gulf of Mexico. If they proceeded farther the results of their discovery would be lost. They began their homeward voyage on the 17th of July. Paddling against the current all day under a midsummer sun, sleeping at night in a malarial atmosphere, subsisting on scant, unwholesome food, Marquette soon sickened. With him it was the beginning of the end. By toilsome stages they reached the Illinois River and ascended it, believing it an easier course to Lake Michigan than by way of the Wisconsin River. Under the guidance of a band of young Illinois warriors they reached the lake. They coasted its western shores and landed at Green Bay toward the end of September. They had been absent about four months, during which time they had paddled over 2,500 miles.

Of this memorable voyage Marquette kept a journal. Sparks says:

The narrative itself is written in a terse, simple, and unpretentious style. The author relates what occurs and describes what he sees without embellishment or display. He writes as a scholar and as a man of careful observation and practical sense. There is no tendency to exaggeration, nor any attempt to magnify the difficulties he had to encounter or the importance of his discoveries. In every point of view this tract is one of the most interesting among those which illustrate the early history of America.

At Green Bay, in the hope of recovery, Marquette remained during the winter and summer. The following fall, feeling somewhat restored, he started to the country of the Illinois with two Frenchmen and a band of Pottawatomies. They passed over the portage at Sturgeon Bay and followed the western shore of Lake Michigan. Storms baffled them. It took them a month to reach the Chicago River. Here Marquette's malady, the dysentery, took hold on him anew. Too feeble to proceed, he spent the winter with his two companions near the present site of Chicago, a prey to hunger, cold, and disease. But he had promised the Indians at Kaskaskia, on the Illinois River, that he would return. He found strength enough in the spring to visit them, and was greeted by them "like an angel from heaven."

His life was fast ebbing. He decided to set out for St. Ignace, wishing to die among his brother missionaries. The party moved northward along the eastern shore of Lake Michigan. On the 18th of May, 1675, knowing that his end was approaching, he landed. He gave directions as to his burial, asked the forgiveness of his companions for the trouble which he had caused them, then peacefully passed away.

Two years after his death a party of Kiskakons, former disciples of his, hunting thereabouts, sought out his grave. They placed his bones in a birchen box. With a flotilla of 80 canoes they conveyed it reverently to St. Ignace. King Arthur's mortuary bark did not bear to the Island of Avalon the earthly remains of a more chivalric soul. Priests, Indians, and traders assembled on the shore to receive the funeral cortege. They carried the rustic casket to the chapel, where it was buried to the sound of the church-going bell and the harmonious accents of his mother tongue, "with tapers burning, like his zeal, and incense rising, like his aspirations, to heaven."

Gentleness, courage, self-sacrifice, were the characteristics of Marquette.

In fortitude he was the equal of his brother missionaries. In native refinement and in education he was their superior. He was a zealot, if you will. But I have no quarrel on that ground. Religion is the jewel in the toad's head; let each one carry his own.

With him, the longings of a sensitive heart, divorced from earth, sought solace in the skies. A subtle element of romance was blended with the fervor of his worship and hung like an illumined cloud over the harsh and hard realities of his daily lot.

He was a Jesuit, it is true. Whatever faults the Jesuits of those days may have had were peculiar to their time. The Puritans, for instance, were every whit as bigoted as they. Their conduct in other countries is not in question here. In North America they stand the transcendent heroes in the advancing army of civilization. As explorers, they pushed into the cruel wilderness, unfalteringly, self-devotedly, far to the front, where others followed with calculating circumspection.

Bancroft writes of them:

Defying the severity of climate, wading through water or through snows, without the comfort of fire; having no bread but pounded corn, and often no food but the unwholesome moss from the rocks; laboring incessantly; exposed to live, as it were, without nourishment, without a resting place; to travel far, and always incurring perils; to carry their lives in their hands, or, rather, daily and oftener than every day, to hold them up as targets, expecting captivity, death from the tomahawk, tortures, and fire.

But the qualities of priest and of Jesuit had no part in determining Wisconsin's choice of Marquette for the honors of Statuary Hall. His pure and saint-like life, his writings and his fame as the explorer of the Mississippi controlled the selection. He was the first white man to traverse our territory and write a description of it. He was the first to map out our confines. He gave a name to the river after which our State is called. On our soil he planned his voyage of discovery. From our borders he first caught sight of the waters of the Mississippi.

Marquette is the one great historic character identified with our State. Wisconsin has developed many notable men. They are the men of yesterday who may seem great to-day, but to-morrow their names will be lost in obscurity. Not so with Marquette. On the pages of history his name will shine the brighter as time goes on.

Mr. KYLE. Mr. President, on the shores of the upper St. Lawrence and the chain of lakes extending to the Superior are to be found the footprints of French explorers who more than two centuries ago were the first to penetrate that unknown wilderness. Ferdinand De Soto, a Spaniard, had, a century before this, reached Florida by the West Indies and had pushed his way to the Mississippi in 1541; but little was known of that vast region except extravagant tales told by wandering tribes of Indians. Prior to De Soto's discovery, James Cartier, the distinguished navigator, had in 1535 discovered the St. Lawrence and taken formal possession of the country in the name of Francis I of France. The French thus having possessions, had from time to time sent explorers and missionaries to the frontier. Father Dreuilletes had traversed the region from the St. Lawrence to the Kennebec and on to the sea. Father Allouez, who had founded the Ottawa mission and had labored among the Indians as far west as Green Bay, welcomed Marquette. Samuel De Champlain had founded Quebec in 1608, and had explored much of the territory from there to Lake Huron. The cities of St. Louis, St. Joseph, St. Charles, mark the path of French exploration along the Mississippi, and Joliet, Sault Ste. Marie, Marquette, and others along the Great Lakes. Many of these towns are the sites of early mission stations.

Prominent among these early explorers may be mentioned James Marquette. He was born in France of a family well known in civil and military life. His mother was a woman of rare culture and piety. From her Marquette inherited those traits of character which made him priest instead of soldier. From early childhood great pains had been taken with his education along secular and ecclesiastical lines, and he was doubtless moved with deeds of bravery, both on the field of battle and on the frontier, by missionaries of the Cross. His soul was fired by the enthusiasm of Ignatius Loyola, who, a century before, casting aside luxury and fortune, had founded the Society of Jesus and had, without purse or script, gone forth by the Cross alone to Christianize northern Europe. Deeds of war to his mind were transitory, a mere passing glory, while a life of sacrifice for his fellow-men would win laurels from the Prince of Peace.

At an early age Marquette entered the religious Society of Jesus, where he spent fourteen years in study and contemplation. He had dwelt on the lives of the early church missionaries who carried the gospel to Germany, Switzerland, France, and England in the early centuries of the Christian era and had built monasteries and convents in these heathen lands. Such pioneer work had the air of romance, and instead of settling in some staid parish of his native land he determined to cast his lot with the settlers of the New World and devote his life to Christianizing the savages of the frontier. He accordingly sailed for French Canada, landing at Quebec in 1666, a hundred years before this region was made historic by the French and Indian wars.

To us who now journey over the scene of his travels by means of the Grand Trunk Canadian lines, or make the tour of the lakes on palatial steamships, it is difficult to picture the hardships of pioneer exploration. History records that after spending a couple of years in studying the Huron and Algonquin languages, Marquette set out for his Lake Superior mission accompanied by a couple of guides. His course was by boat up the Ottawa River and Georgian Bay to Lake Huron, a distance of several hundred miles, thence to Sault Ste. Marie, where he founded a mission. Subsequently he moved his station to La Pointe, where he labored among the Hurons and Ottawas. In 1671 the Sioux Nation made war upon his tribes, and he was forced with them to Mackinaw, where he founded the mission of St. Ignatius.

While at La Pointe he had heard from roving bands of Indians of the mighty Mississippi and determined to push his way to it, but owing to warlike demonstrations among the tribes he was unable to make the journey till 1673, when Joliet reached Mackinaw with a commission from the governor of Canada to attempt the discovery of the Mississippi. Marquette, who had waited patiently and prayerfully, considered this a providential circumstance, and accordingly joined Joliet and his five men. This small company made the journey through great privations, their shelter at night being rudely constructed huts and their subsistence Indian meal and the game of the forests. Their course was through Lake Michigan and Green Bay, thence up the Fox River in Wisconsin to the Divide. Carrying their boats a short distance, they launched them in the Wisconsin River and continued their journey, reaching the Mississippi June 17, 1674.

Quoting from our worthy Chaplain, Dr. Milburn—

Streams with broader openings to the sea there are, with grander historic associations, with more romantic memories thronging their banks; but what one of all earth's water courses can vie with this majestic appeal to the imagination and hope of mankind? A great, silent joy was in Marquette's breast, and as grateful tears wet his eyes he offered a fervent thanksgiving that he had been permitted to look upon this wonder. The devout spirit thought of the greatest birth of time, and in commemoration of it he named the river "The Conception." For eight days they glided over the crystal pavement between shores widening to the distance of half a league, and then approaching in rocky bluffs, as if they were the towers and battlements of hostile cities, to within a few hundred yards. In vernal pasture lands they beheld the moose and the elk and the deer cropping the herbage, and lower down vast herds of buffalo grazed in the meadows, and the woods were filled with flocks of wild turkeys. For fifteen days they had not come in sight or trace of the habitation of human beings. At length they discerned a well-marked trail on the west bank of the river, and landed to seek the men whose feet had left it. With minds moved alternately by hopes and fears, Marquette and Joliet proceeded 6 miles, when they descried three Indian villages. Uttering a loud cry, they rapidly approached them. A company of old men came forth to meet them, and when asked by Marquette who they were replied, "We are Illinois." Great was the good father's joy. He explained who he and his companions were, whereupon they were joyfully welcomed with the peace pipe. Then followed six days of feasting. Heartily did the simple natives urge the Frenchmen to tarry with them. But their task was not half performed, and they must up and away. Taking an affectionate farewell of their kind hosts, they were escorted to their canoes and presented with a calumet magnificently adorned, than which no more valuable gift could have been made them.

It was thus Marquette first met his beloved "Illinois," and his life's aim thereafter was to settle among and preach the gospel to this tribe. For a month they paddled their boats with the current, making note of what they saw, and stopping only to greet or hold council with Indians on the banks, not knowing whether the waters would carry them to the Pacific or to the Southern Gulf.

Reaching a point near the Arkansas River, and being convinced that the river discharged its waters into the Gulf of Mexico, they began their return journey under great difficulties. Marquette was taken ill, and it was only with the greatest care that he survived to reach Lake Michigan. The return journey was made by way of the Illinois River, the company reaching Green Bay in September. Marquette subsequently rallied and determined to found on the Illinois his mission called the Immaculate Conception. This he undertook, and in December, 1674, reached the spot where Chicago now stands. He had the honor of erecting there the first cabin and church. A little later he visited the Kaskaskias, but failing health warned him to cease his labors. His desire was to reach Green Bay and spend his last hours among his Indian friends. For many days his companions plied the oar in Lake Michigan, inspiring their friend with hope. They were, however, compelled to take him ashore, where, on the soil of Michigan, he died and was buried. Subsequently some friendly Indians removed his remains to St. Ignatius Mission, at Mackinaw, where, beneath the church floor, they now rest.

Such is the story of Marquette's life—a short one. He was but 38 years of age, and had spent but six years in his chosen mission, and yet he carved a name for himself both as philanthropist and explorer. His mission was to carry the gospel to a heathen people; yet he rendered great service to our country as a pioneer of civilization.

To such men our nation rightfully does honor. Marquette stands for a great class of Christian missionaries who have led the vanguard of explorers into the unknown parts of the earth. From the time St. Boniface carried the gospel to Germany, in the eighth century, and Ansgar, the apostle of the north, to Scandinavia, until now, when missionaries of all denominations are penetrating the jungles of Africa, the church has been foremost in discovery and has rendered untold service to civilization. Eliot and Brainerd spent their lives on the frontiers of Massachusetts and Pennsylvania, and paved the way for later settlements. Dr. Stephen R. Riggs, born early in this century, is known and revered in Minnesota and the Dakotas for his labors among the Sioux Indians. In 1839, when white people thought it dangerous to cross beyond the Mississippi, Dr. Riggs established his mission at Lac Qui Parle. Soon after he crossed into the Dakotas and spent a long and useful life among the Sioux. Besides his schools and churches—the result of his religious work—he left nearly fifty volumes of literature relating to the Indians, among them being a grammar and dictionary of the Sioux languages. Not less valued are the services of Marcus Whitman, who, under the American Board, went as missionary physician to the Territory of Oregon in 1839. He, with his associate missionaries, blazed his way into the forests of Oregon to carry the gospel to the Indians, but noted the valleys of fertile land, with valuable forests and streams, and in 1842, when the Webster-Ashburton treaty was under consideration by the Senate, Whitman made the journey from Oregon to Washington on horseback with but one companion and a guide. This vast territory was represented by the British as worthless and inaccessible, and the land would have been given them but for the representations of Whitman, who arrived on the 3d of March, just before the ratification of the treaty. The State of Oregon and the United States owe this distinguished missionary a debt of gratitude that can not be paid. Four years after this trip he and his family were massacred by the Cayuse Indians and buried at Wallawalla. Time would not permit, Mr. President, the enumeration of the missionaries of the church, both Catholic and Protestant, who have laid the world under obligations for their valuable discoveries. It was David Livingstone who left his Scottish home to spend a life of hardship in the interior of Africa. His was a gospel mission to the benighted natives, but he ranks with the great explorers of his generation. Missionaries were among the first to visit the Hawaiian Islands, and certainly the first to demonstrate their commercial value to the world.

Thus, Mr. President, the church has added greatly to the geographic and scientific knowledge of the world. To this great class of discoverers belongs James Marquette. He was saintly in character, unselfish in his purposes, and untiring in his efforts to bring the message of gladness to darkest civilization. How striking the contrast between this man and De Soto and scores of explorers whose ambition was gold. As many of his predecessors had done, Marquette gave his life for those he loved. Dr. Milburn well remarks, "When we hear of faith and love like theirs, can we say contemptuously, 'They were Jesuits,' and forget they were Christians sealing their testimony with their blood?"

Marquette had made a journey of 2,500 miles, touching the territory of four of our Northwest States. His mission was to the Indians. He had left to Joliet the part of reporting their journey to the governor of Canada. He was content to remain and die with those for whom he had labored. His life is beautiful in self-sacrifice. His discovery ranks among the foremost and most important on the continent; and it is to Marquette the explorer that we do honor at this time. Though a simple missionary of the cross and without a possession in the world, his name is written beside those of De Soto, Balboa, Cartier, Joliet, and others who are enrolled in the historical annals of our country.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. President, the State of Wisconsin has selected and presented to the United States to be placed in the "Hall of Heroes," the statue of James Marquette. It will, when accepted, take its place among the marble and bronze representations of the great men selected by the States as their ideals of lofty characteristics and noble deeds.

No State has chosen better than Wisconsin in selecting Père Marquette as the representative of courage, resolution, and devotion to the elevation of humanity.

Mr. President, mankind honors heroes, and the history of our race in all ages exhibits the universal disposition to honor names ennobled by the possession and the exhibition of great qualities. Eminent soldiers are oftentimes the objects of popular regard and adulation, and it is to great commanders we are ready to attribute highest qualities.

The public grounds of this magnificent city afford abundant proof of the truth of these reflections, for in nearly all of them are to be found the statues of soldiers who have won distinction—Washington, Lafayette, Greene, Jackson, Scott, and leaders who distinguished themselves at later periods. Civil fame does not bear such rich and generous fruit, though the qualities which go to constitute greatness in military and civil life are much the same.

Washington and Jefferson, Jackson and Clay, Grant and Lincoln alike possessed great sagacity, exalted courage, and, what is more impressive if not more valuable than either, unflinching, unflagging resolution. Sagacity, by which term I mean to include extraordinary wisdom, often perceives and exaggerates danger. Courage is sometimes intermittent, while resolution, when associated with the qualities I have mentioned, utilizes both, and gives them steadiness, persistent force, and success, when success is possible.

Lincoln never commanded an army in the field, but many of us know that his patient resolution, which checked the desperate purposes of the rash and extravagant and supported the faltering and the timid, equaled Grant, who would "fight it out on that line if it took all summer."

James Marquette, whose history is brief, was, we are informed, born in 1637, one hundred years before the birth of our Washington.

When about 17 years of age he joined the Jesuits, evidently from motives purely religious, and in 1666 he was sent to the mission of Canada. His talent as a linguist must have been great, for within a few years he learned to speak six Indian languages.

Parkman, whom I follow, says:

A subtle element of romance was blended with the fervor of his worship, and hung like an illumined cloud over the harsh and hard realities of his daily lot; kindled by the smile of his celestial mistress, his gentle and noble nature knew no fear. For her he burned to dare and to suffer, discover new lands, and conquer new realms to her sway.

In the journal of his voyage, after referring to a particular change made in his destination, he wrote:

I was the more delighted at this good news, because I saw my plans about to be accomplished and found myself in the happy necessity of exposing my life for the elevation of all these tribes, and especially of the Illinois, who, when I was at Pointe St. Esprit, had begged me to bring the Word of God among them.

He then made preparation for the expedition he was about to undertake. The outfit of the travelers was very simple. They provided themselves with two birch-bark canoes and a supply of smoked meat and Indian corn, embarked with five men, and began their voyage on the 17th day of May, 1673.

It is needless to describe the route of the adventurous voyagers. They reached the Wisconsin; they discovered and descended the Mississippi River, passing the mouths of the Illinois, the Missouri, the Ohio, and the Arkansas. Without weapons of offense or defense, they visited tribes of turbulent and ferocious savages, armed only with the sublime doctrine of "Peace on earth and good will to men." His efforts for the civilization of the savages he visited prove his boundless benevolence.

The story of his death and burial by the shore of Lake Michigan is full of pathos.

His comrades, knowing his death to be near, built a shed of bark for his protection. With perfect cheerfulness and composure he gave directions for his burial. . . . At night, seeing they were fatigued, he told them to take rest, saying he would call them when he felt his time approaching. Two or three hours after they heard a feeble voice, and hastening to his side found him at the point of death. He expired calmly, murmuring the names of Jesus and Mary, with his eyes fixed upon the crucifix which one of his followers held before him.

They dug a grave beside the hut, and there buried him according to the directions he had given.

Whether his remains rest where they were placed by the hands of his comrades or were removed to St. Ignace is perhaps uncertain; but whatever may be true in that respect, the gentle breezes of the lakes sing his requiem, and we may hope that a spirit so pure and gentle and yet so brave and resolute rests where peace abounds forever.

Mr. President, Father Marquette was a priest—I do not hesitate to speak of him by that respectful title—was an explorer, and an apostle to all the tribes and peoples he might discover. He combined the courage and resolution of Paul, and of Judson, and of Brainerd with the gentleness of John and the humanity and self-devotion of Damien, who gave his life to the service of the lepers. He had more of courage and resolution than a soldier, for without intending to resist the dangers he might encounter he met the threats of savages without fear, inspired with love for them and an eager desire to promote their temporal and eternal welfare.

Mr. President, the State of Wisconsin has selected this marble representation of this extraordinary man as its contribution to the Hall of Statuary. The selection is one worthy to be made, and the statue of Père Marquette will stand in that hall, surrounded by other statues representing men whose names will not die or be forgotten while respect and veneration for true manhood survives.

I hope it will not degrade or even lower the dignity of this occasion if I should say that I do not assent to Roman Catholic theories of ecclesiasticism, but I would despise myself if the garb of a priest of that church could hide from my view the noble, resolute, devout Christian hero within.

Mr. VILAS. Mr. President, when this lusty nation, outgrowing the habitations of its youth, built new council chambers for its legislators it was a happy thought that consecrated to the noble art of sculpture the old Hall of the House of Representatives, where patriotism will hear the echoes ring forever of glorious words there spoken for liberty and justice among men. Nor less felicitous was the plan which proposed to the sovereign associates in Federal Union the work of its embellishment as authors and sharers, in fraternal equality, of the national prizes of honor and fame to be there illustrated and preserved. So, naturally enough, came up the suggestion that was directed by Congress to go with the invitation which the President was empowered to give, desiring the States to select for this noble commemoration from among them who in life on earth had been their citizens "illustrious for historic renown or for distinguished civic or military services." It was the offspring, too, of a time when the country throbbled with patriotic fervor, and all hearts and minds were fixed on the mighty conflict then raging, the year 1864, when the world witnessed the soldiers of the Union clinched in a death grapple with the great revolt, and surely saw the last issue of war had been joined, and that with the coming triumph a glory unequalled in the annals of mankind would be won by the heroes of liberty.

This restriction of the invitation was, however, very differently applicable to the States of our Federation. The older, especially the original thirteen, had gained even then, as States, a historic past. Among their possessions "already secure" were the records of a time beyond the memory of living men; and if not yet dim or misty still we are able to see in perspective the creative and memorable deeds done in the course of their evolution, distinguishing the merit of achievement as contemporaries can never see it. They may, therefore, justly lay peculiar claims to noble figures, radiant among the shades, whose story is the treasure of all Americans, and say, "These were our citizens."

But, sir, the conditions are necessarily somewhat different with the newer States like Wisconsin. For, although as part of colonial grants whose base was on the Atlantic coast, our territory shared with the earliest the boon of independence; it long lay an almost unknown land, the remote corner of the old Northwest of the Republic. During many ensuing years the eager crowd of home seekers pushed out upon a course southward of the Great Lakes, unconscious of the surpassing excellence, riches, and beauty with which nature had endowed her land of choice, and so left it the prize of a later but not less fortunate generation. Thus it happens that while Wisconsin takes date with the first in liberty and title, her entrance to the Union was preceded not only by ten States—all the States, in fact, until Virginia was divided in war—which were built upon the soil won from Great Britain but also by six erected upon later acquisitions, four of them even beyond the Mississippi. Her organization as a Territory, a Territory then stretching from Lake Michigan to the Missouri, is within the recollection of venerable Senators still in honored service in this Chamber. So it was that but sixteen years had passed of statehood when this invitation was received to share the honor and duty of contribution to the nation's Hall of Statuary.

To accept it, therefore, in terms unqualified, demanded choice among contemporaries for the special commemoration; an invidious task, not congenial to human nature, inevitably to be shrunk from. There was no chance for a far retrospection through the aisles of time, with its softening lights, its soothing oblivion, its justice in relative measurements, its elimination of true desert. Many were the brave and generous spirits, the strong and helpful, among our pioneers and the builders of our State, whom the respect and affection of their fellows commend to the grateful remembrance of posterity; too many most cherished to be omitted by a particularization of some. And when the war time befell, and manhood heard throughout the land the call of Liberty to arms, the answering voice of Wisconsin came not from some daring few, in advanced leadership of thought and action; but from every home and hearthstone, through town and countryside, responding thousands poured forth to battle, knowing well their cause; near one-half of all her voting citizens bore her banner, floating beside the Stars and Stripes on every field of war in the Southern land, and her list of true heroes a Homer might worthily sing. Not yet do we dare the choice among them, all so cherished in honor and esteem.

And so it was that, from no lack of sensibility, no lethargy of appreciation, more than twenty years passed by while the national summons to participate in an undertaking so honorable remained, not unheeded, yet unanswered.

But, sir, although the sway of nature was there longer undisturbed by immigration and settlement, that goodly land made, in fact, its entrance to the page of American history at a far earlier date. Indeed, its discovery and visitation by the white man had much precedence in time over many of our sister States of prior establishment in the Union. A peculiar charm attaches to the story of those early days. It is augmented by the very length of the intervening period before the settlements of civilization came, during which the activity of development elsewhere increased the seeming quiet there. This has cast back into even deeper shade its historic dawn, and thrown upon the simple facts something like the twilight hues of an ancient story. But fourteen years after the Mayflower sowed her precious seed on "the wild New England shore," Jean Nicolle paddled his canoe through the rich natural rice fields of the Fox in the center of our present borders. Before any footstep but of red men had been imprinted on the western slopes of the Alleghenies, "the good tidings of great joy" sent down through the ages by a crucified Saviour were delivered to His barbaric children of the forest in the far interior Wisconsin land.

It was Nature's way of shaping the continent which thus lured the explorer to its very heart so soon after settlement was begun upon its borders. Once upon the magnificent waters of those great interior seas, the like of which the earth does not elsewhere show, a fascination irresistible pressed on to their fountain head. Side by side, often even hand in hand, cupidity and benevolence, with daring hardihood, urged the quest; and the trader's greedy courage found more than a match in the unfaltering hearts who challenged the horrors of the wilderness, bent on no selfish aim, but wholly to rescue the imperiled souls within its deep recesses. It so came to pass that without intermediate establishments of any sort, without even journey posts or resting stations, or a white man's abode along the entire route, Christianity had her missions domiciled in Wisconsin, on Lake Superior and Green Bay, while the advanced frontier of European movement, the nearest settlement or residence to the east, was a thousand miles away at Montreal.

The heavy forest stood, in primeval majesty, stretching to the prairies of the Mississippi from the mountains of the East, and not one of the coming race had ventured once within its awful solitudes. Through the vast woods westward from the Hudson and the Delaware roamed the merciless Iroquois in terrible dominion, the scourge and destroyer of the savage race, the Tartars of the wilderness, whose butcheries multiplied and deepened its solitudes and filled them with perils and horrors.

And there, sir, in the deep interior of the continent, on whose wild primeval surface no light of civilization cast a ray save the flickerings here and there begun to show along the ocean margin, there in that vast isolation, that "profoundly obscure," the lamp of Christianity was kindled by the spark brought from Calvary, and its gleams burst forth above the forest gloom, a solitary beacon, presaging and beckoning to the oncoming column of humanity soon to march thitherward in triumphant splendor. And there, sir, slender and feeble as was that early flame, and though amid sometimes distressing vicissitudes and perils, there has it ever burned unquenched. There, in the first faint gray of morning, a Caucasian's home was builded and church and school were founded; and thus, with typical step, civilization, the civilization of highest evolution, made its advent to the continent's interior on the land of Wisconsin, and, in a sense, Wisconsin took also her beginning as one among civilization's grandest forms and agencies, a self-governed Commonwealth of intelligent, God-fearing freemen.

Among the shadowy forms that move on that far-off scene, touched by the light rosy ray that tells of a splendor coming in its time, among the brave who dared the peril of that morning hour, was one, the type and exemplar of a noble class, fixed in human honor by devotion, heroism, and sacrifice, in whose soul burned also the genius of the explorer, the glorious greed of knowledge. Short and swiftly sped was his path to the altar of self-sacrifice, so often the goal of his class, but his few hard years were enough for his renown; he departed for the world beyond rewarded by the fame of history here. He was a citizen of Wisconsin only in its embryonic age; no more; but otherwise it was of such as him that Congress spake when it marked for this special honor "persons illustrious for historic renown."

Wherefore, Mr. President, the legislature of Wisconsin, unwilling that a State which yields in public spirit and intelligence to none should stand no sharer in the national gallery of honor, and conceiving the true sense of the Congressional plan to comprehend whatever achievements upon our country's soil have brilliantly wrought toward its predestined usefulness to man, proposed to Congress that Wisconsin should be permitted, at once and together, to recognize and honor the men who daringly planted there the first abode of civilization; to distinguish and illustrate the noblest character in the vanguard of its march—the missionary of Christ; and to celebrate also a famous triumph of geographic exploration from within her borders, by raising here the marble effigy of that gentle, devoted, high-souled, fearless priest and teacher, James Marquette, the discoverer of the Mississippi.

Well knowing, of course, that the original invitation was, for the reason given, not literally a full authority therefor, the consent of Congress was explicitly sought. Twice the legislature of the State declared itself; by its act of 1887, and again, when its Senators, or one of them, hesitated in doubt of its true desire, by its joint resolution of 1893, "urgently requesting" those Senators to secure that assent of the Government. And Congress twice responded with the desired permission. At first, the concurrence of the Senate in a joint resolution of the House of Representatives was given on the last day of the Fifty-second Congress, too late for Executive consideration among the mass of crowding measures.

The next session, first of the Fifty-third Congress, supplied the failure, and by joint resolution approved on the 14th of October, 1893, the State of Wisconsin was "authorized and granted the privilege of placing in Statuary Hall at the Capitol the statue of Père Marquette, the faithful missionary, whose work among the Indians and explorations within the borders of said State in early days are recognized all over the civilized world."

In these terms the Congress testified, Mr. President, its intelligence and appreciation of the moving considerations which justly award to this missionary and explorer a commemoration among the historic characters of America. The choice of Wisconsin was ratified, and the free interpretation which carried back the theory of citizenship to the early movers on her soil found approval.

The privilege bestowed has been exercised as it should have been. By universal testimony a work of art unexcelled has been erected in our Hall. The representatives of the State feel no other need than to say, "Go, view the artist's work, gaze upon the noble figure discerned by genius in the Italian stone. There you shall find the ideal we would commemorate; a noble man, with a soul lifted up to God, a mind inflexibly bent to duty, a heart swelling with tenderness toward his fellow-creatures, so surely treading the pathway lighted to him by education and conscience that suffering, privation, danger, death, could cause no shadow of turning in it; yet still the gentle, enthusiastic, generous man, beloved among his fellows—the man to dare without flinching, to do without boasting, the deeds that heroes do, when heaven calls."

Perhaps so I might leave it, confident in the award of credit so justly due the good State I love for its worthy gift, and conscious that the eloquent remarks of my colleague and other Senators have left no addition needful by me.

But yet, sir, I would wish to contribute something, if I could, to distinguish with clarity the figure and career of Marquette from confusion with intermingling persons and events in the background of history, and give a plainer view of what he was and what he did by drawing to the eye the circumstances in which he stood and acted.

For the discovery of the Mississippi in 1673 the Muse of History has recorded his name to stand forever on her unfading scroll.

Yet there be some, perhaps many, who see in that achievement little more than a summer ride in a bark canoe down the beautiful Wisconsin River, as if it were in the sunlight and sweet airs, the peace and security, which the student tourist of our day oft delights in as he traces again the famous water path of exploration. It is an indolent, thoughtless view. Far different has been—ever must be—the just measure of its character and merit. A strong, vivid imagination, capable of reproducing the facts colored from memorials of the time, a penetrating sympathy with beliefs and modes of thought then entertained, must gain sway in any mind which will realize the conditions then and there environing and characterizing human effort.

It was the fruit of no sudden inspiration, fortuitously conceived and hastily executed. Already so far sunk in the immensity of forest wilds, with horrors on its trail and terrors in front, exploration had for a period halted on the shores of Superior and Michigan, or moved but little in adjacent territory. Eight years had passed since the first white man's house was built on the Bay of Chequamegon to give a home to the mission of the Holy Ghost, and all that undertaking a panic of terror had ruined, driving thence backward to the Straits of Mackinac the converts who had found a refuge there. For in the unknown Western country dwelt the Sioux, monsters of bloody deeds, the constant fear of all natives within reach of their excursions. Marquette, then beginning the labors to which he had consecrated his life, had wrought there with the tribes whose summer wanderings, like of modern tourists, carried them to the great Northern Sea. Among them the Illinois, who told him stories of the great river, long before then a misty rumor, a far-off unreality. It fired his imagination and stirred his heart with hope that craving souls in other lands might hear the Gospel's tidings from his lips. He reported to his superiors, opened the plan, and waited obediently. It required years before the answering orders followed. Then came Joliet, with five other Frenchmen. Seven men, no more, were thus to hazard the unknown regions, of which no native spoke but in notes of warning. They heard on every hand foreboding tales of terror, of mysterious and dreadful dangers. Monsters would be found in the waters, the fiercest savages upon the lands.

It was an age of credulity, and the stoutest hearts quailed often before chimeras of the fancy springing from the dread unknown. Now every friendly tribe, with common voice, at the Green Bay, along the Fox, and at the village of the Mascoutins and Miamis, where they bid adieu to the last frontier of the known, to the last friendly face, all picture only coming peril, with supplication to change their purpose. Yet on they pushed their way; timorously at times we may well imagine; with straining eye, as their frail canoes swept the bending curves of the Wisconsin; with hearts that sometimes throbbed, but unfalteringly, resolute of purpose. At length, a full month gone since they started from the Green Bay—the traveler now needs hardly a day—and there it rolled before them, the Father of Waters; there, as for untold ages all unknown, the majestic servant of nature's mighty plan! They had found it! For nearly forty years the voyageurs had passed the tale, the mystery of Indian report, of the great water in the West; now they saw it with their eyes in veritable majesty!

Mr. President, perhaps no man without experience can bring to himself by any effort a full sympathy with the emotion which such an achievement must stir in the explorer's mind. The long dream of meditation, the ripening purpose, the fixed plan, the execution begun, the hard labors done, the menacing perils met, all at last compressed to perfect fruition in a single moment! Who can measure it by any gauge but experience, yet who but must feel it worth a life to win? The judgment of the world has given accordant honor, and brightly shines the name of the discoverer on the temple wall of Fame.

Sir, no balance can invidiously weigh in competition the variant elements of merit in the many who have lifted the veil of mystery over hidden lands. One star differeth from another star in glory. There can be forever but one Columbus; never another Magellan. But the pages will never want for readers on which are written the stories of the discovery of the Mississippi and of the sources of the Nile, nor fade the names of Livingstone and Marquette.

Yet this was not discovery complete. They knew well their duty, and, though plunging afresh into the depths of prophesied perils, on they fared, out upon its wide waters, fearlessly bent to know the bounds and course set to the mighty flood in the plan of the continent, to carry back to civilized men a broadened field of knowledge, a new map, re-forming the old terra incognita. A full month longer, oft in dangers great and real, they sturdily and bravely held their purpose down its turgid current, among strange lands and tribes, and marked its assured flowage to the Gulf of Mexico. Then, their mission fulfilled, to return with its fruits no longer jeopardized was the ensuing duty, second only in importance.

It should perhaps be noticed, sir, that in point of fact, as men now know, more than a century before the Mississippi had twice been seen by European eyes. Coasting on the Gulf in 1519, De Pineda turned through its mouth and sailed up this river, no one knows how far. Wandering over the continent in 1542, De Soto crossed it, near the Yazoo's mouth, ascended for a distance its western bank, died, and was buried in it. Neither event gave the river to the world. Where it was, what it was, whence it came, what the countries of its drainage—all were untold. Water only had been found, a fluvial mystery unsolved. Geography had gained nothing, nor, until Marquette had shown it, was the water known to be the Mississippi which these wanderers had seen. Only he who looks on past events without a perspective, like a Chinese drawing, confounds these transactions. Nor by one jot or tittle has it lessened the meed of honor measured to Marquette.

It is to this historic event, Mr. President, that the personal distinction of Marquette in the annals of America is to be ascribed. It was not conspicuously gained by service in his capacity of a missionary priest. Others shared with him the excellence, the labors, the sorrows of that character to a not inferior degree. But Fame, like the first beams of morning, gilds the heights of singular eminence, and men worship most the victories which increase dominion. And "Peace hath her victories not less renowned than war." It was his geographical conquest, the opening to man of a country unequalled in capacity for his enjoyment, the broad and splendid region of the Mississippi's drainage, which marked him for illustration by succeeding generations. Mainly this it was that affixed his name to the handsome city on the shore of Superior, to counties in the States that adjoin that wide water, and has led to the erection of the stately figure in marble now placed in the keeping of the nation.

But there mingles also, sir, a just respect for the heroic messenger of Christianity to God's children in the wilderness which has entered into its design and will share in the commemoration to endure in this monument—may it be for ages. The statue is itself an idealization, yet it is believed so natural, so true, that every detail is but genuine exposition of personality and character. If the artist has thrown into the beauty of the face the look and lineaments which tell the far sight, the fixed hope, the unbending courage of the successful explorer, they comport and mingle with features informed by submissive piety, benevolence, and zeal to do the will of God. Sir, the early missionary to the Indian the world will never cease to reverence, as heroism and goodness must be revered, however differently the light may fall in after times on beliefs and methods then entertained and pursued. Among them all, of whatever church or creed, Marquette deserves place with the foremost. Not that the effects he wrought were great, nor his experience of suffering unsurpassed. Others in that "noble army of martyrs" perhaps accomplished more and suffered more. It was the abundant power in him oft and fully manifested, the spirit that burned within, and his sad untimely loss, rather than shining achievements in his few years of labor, that give his prominence as a missionary among the mission pioneers.

Mr. President, you have heard in the appropriate and interesting remarks of our colleagues the story of his career pleasingly told. Who that listened can picture to himself the conditions which then beset the devoted wanderer in that far interior, and withhold admiration of the intrepid self-consecration that took him there on such an errand? I tried a few moments since to draw to the mind by some lines the superficial picture the continent then presented, the helplessness of these missionaries' remote isolation, their necessarily absolute surrender to the fate of the wilderness. But how can one now depict to entire realization all the meaning of peril and horror that resignation then implied to them who ventured on in the very light, as it were, of the fires which had consumed their martyred predecessors?

For bitter, indeed, had been the missionaries' experiences on the very path they traveled. Once already, in the wilds between Huron and Ontario, the soldiers of the cross had performed labors and endured privations the tale of which must ever excite pity and admiration, and yet their catastrophe had been utter and horrible. Through sufferings and indignities that might have rather moved despair, love and faith had bred still a sustaining hope. Never was its light more awfully extinguished. Their unhappy converts first were decimated by smallpox, and then upon them fell the fiendish Iroquois. Horrible was the fate of all. Massacre, even to annihilation, swept the friendly tribes—men, mothers, babes—from the face of the earth; and death, death through torments inconceivable but to savage ingenuity, the slow exhaustion of vital force amid lingering flames while agonizing wounds lacerated the inflamed flesh, had been the portion dealt the messengers of divine love. The annals of heroic devotion have no tale more pitiful than the constancy in duty to their disgusting pupils, and for it the awful earthly recompense, of the faithful fathers, Brebeuf and Lallemant.

Such was the present example, such the impending menace—martyrdom through agony unspeakable for the missionary, butchery for his converts—that lay across the path of the young priest of 29 as he set forth upon his lonely way to La Pointe de St. Esprit, on the Bay of Chequamegon. And to what a task assigned! Not, like the voyageur or trader, to plunge licitiously into the wild Indian life, rejoicing in its freedom and adventure, reckless of results. The Christian missionary met those natives to challenge their habits of thought, to attack their traditions of life, to rebuke their morals. Yet his appeal was to a spiritual nature of which they knew nothing, to hearken to a tale beyond their understanding, to lift them beyond the only world they knew or were capable of knowing. At first, perhaps, he might win attention by the charm of novelty, attractive always to the savage as even to animal nature. That away was but momentary; his teaching necessarily carried reproof; and, gentle as he made it, few of those coarse, fierce spirits would tolerate it. Their frequent return and sometimes habitual usage were contumely, ridicule, indignity. Disgustful alike to his education, breeding, taste, was every close contact with them, and nature could but rebel against the duty religion enjoined. Dependent on them for the means of subsistence, his privations were often severe. Yet he toiled with unflinching perseverance, inventing new devices to win their trust and fix their minds on things eternal; always to encounter backsliding and relapse, and ever to see the momentous truths he taught fall like seed upon a stony ground. Whose heart must not melt in sympathy with those words my colleague read from that letter of the wearied Marquette to his superior after the ruin of the mission at St. Esprit:

God alone can fix these fickle minds and place and keep them in His grace and touch their hearts while we stammer in their ears.

Yet bethink you with admiration of the unflagging zeal that in so few years made him master of speech in half a dozen various native tongues, that he might better strive in that desperate work of salvation!

And who so base of spirit that would deny the guerdon of fidelity and goodness when, sick and broken with the malady that sent him to his grave, in the face of coming winter he set off again on the long, hard journey up Lake Michigan from Green Bay, to bring the healing truth to the heathen souls among the Illinois, who loved him? The event realized the gloomy presage with which the journey was begun. That testimony of the faith he gave as a dying man. With return of spring he tried his last chance for life. Borne by his red brethren to the shore near where Chicago teems with multitudes to-day, he was launched in a bark canoe with two friends to paddle the long way to Mackinac. The attempt was vain. One day, gliding along the eastern coast, he recognized his summons and bade them land. They sheltered him with a hut of bark, and he, beseeching forgiveness for all their pains, calmly ordered the particulars of his burial. Parkman, to whom we owe so much, paints with simple eloquence the final scene:

At night, seeing that they were fatigued, he told them to take rest, saying that he would call them when he felt his time approaching. Two or three hours after they heard a feeble voice, and hastening to his side found him at the point of death. He expired calmly, murmuring the names of Jesus and Mary, with his eyes fixed on the crucifix which one of his followers held before him. They dug a grave beside the hut, according to the directions which he had given them, then reembarkeing they made their way to Michillimackinac, to bear the tidings to the priests at the mission of St. Ignace.

Mr. President, let him who doubts the noble excellence of that good man's life contemplate the scene enacted on that coast in the next ensuing year! Then Nature bore her testimony unimpeachable to the wondrous impress of his goodness. A band of Ottawas, seven years before his pupils at La Pointe de St. Esprit, repaired at the bidding solely of their hearts to that lonely grave, with tender hands, after the fashion of their fathers—

Washed and dried the bones, and placed them carefully in a box of birch bark. Then in a procession of 30 canoes they bore it, singing their funeral songs, to St. Ignace of Michillimackinac. As they approached, priests, Indians, and traders all thronged to the shore. The relics of Marquette were received with solemn ceremony, and buried beneath the floor of the little chapel of the mission.

Sir, was ever tribute more genuine paid to king or conqueror? Could proof more ample be of the power of that noble spirit who had thus sent the beams of human kindness through the hearts of those rough savages in whom he saw the children of God? The cold marble in yonder hall, midst all its glorious company, can testify no more clearly to a character fit for remembrance than that wild procession which in the genuine reverence of nature moved slowly through many days adown the waters of Lake Michigan. God's eye was on it; His spirit ruled that scene.

Tell me not of creeds, of sects, or societies. There is a greater confraternity, the brotherhood of man, whose fellowship overrules and embraces all lesser societies and sects, all true men; and nowhere more than in this land of man's enfranchisement ought its triumphant power to break the fetters that narrow and degrade his soul. He who could so stamp his goodness on the hearts of those fickle barbarians, in whose ears he "stammered" the precepts of Christian faith, is worthy to-day and always the remembering honor of all true American manhood; and will surely have it.

But, Mr. President, the State of Wisconsin, now a Commonwealth of 2,000,000 freemen, rejoicing in prosperity and happiness on the soil he trod so long ago, in raising this stone in the nation's Hall of Statuary, does not merely celebrate a name "illustrious for historic renown," a character whose excellence is worthy of perpetual remembrance. It means still more, that it shall stand there as a testimony and monument to a principle of our social order of the utmost value to mankind—the principle of religious liberty! Sir, human intelligence and reason, all the history of the world, teach no more useful and impressive lesson than is embodied in that fundamental rule which draws an absolute and impassable line between the affairs of state and the affairs of religion, and denies to the social law all right or jurisdiction to transcend it. On one side is the citizen, a component of and subject to the state, charged with its duties, obedient to the laws within its sphere. Across it is the man, the creature of Almighty God, His worshiper, His subject, amenable there to His law and no other.

In that domain man is entitled to enjoy all the liberty of nature untrammelled, unchecked, unrestrained by his fellows in the state. There he stands lighted and led by his own conscience. Thither no human law can follow him. If the potentate of human creation pursues him there he may, he must resist, or be recreant to his nature and his God. Unflinching before any menace, undaunted by any power, true to his faith, like Luther in his greater majesty before the Emperor at Worms, he must declare, "Here I stand; I can not do otherwise. God help me. Amen." Sir, this is no rule, as sometimes miscalled, of toleration. I condemn the term. I deny all it implies. It is the right, absolute, uncontrollable, of utter, perfect liberty. It is an inalienable right. The coward, the willing slave, can not divest himself of it. It goes with him in his bondage however recreant he be to nature. And, sir, this right attends and belongs to man as perfectly, also, upon the social side of the great dividing line, though with a different effect. He does not lose it; he retains it there in full perfection. His rights, his duties, his privileges as a citizen in whatever his relations to the state and society comport with and are independent of it.

Sir, he is wrongfully despoiled, his right invaded, a grievous injury done, when to any man is denied any part or share of his social rights or privileges by reason of his religious faith. If property, if place, if honor be his rightful due among his fellows, he who strikes aught away of either because of religious opinion is an enemy to law, to humanity, and all its hopes. Hostis humani generis.

And therefore it is, sir, that this statue of James Marquette will stand as a monument and emblem of religious liberty. The noble right to honor and remembrance among men, which the elgisature of Wisconsin and the Congress of the United States have declared to be his, he is not denied. It is sacredly preserved. This statue is raised to him in no token of his religion, in ascription of no honor to his creed, his opinions. It invites no special countenance from the adherents of any church or any creed. Regardless of all these, neither with favor nor with disfavor to any, this statue—ideal reproduction of him as in life he was—stands to the honor of the discoverer and the man, the testimonial of a people who rejoice in the brotherhood of man, who love liberty, and who guide their conduct by its precepts without a shade of fear.

Sir, no State in all this Union can more worthily, more honorably support this attitude in the presence of the nation and mankind than the State of Wisconsin. There, sir, is a composite citizenship which mingles the blood of all the civilized peoples on the earth. Around their altars gather the faithful servants of God in many and various forms, of many diverse churches, sects, and creeds. Together they abide in fraternity, in liberty, enjoying each his rights, trampling not upon his neighbor. Nowhere is order better maintained, life, person, property more secure. Nowhere does benevolence show a more generous and kindly face in public or in private care of misfortune. Nowhere is education more lavishly supplied; and yet, in strict observance of the rule of liberty, every shade of sectarian instruction—removed from the public schools—is left in unfettered freedom to the schools maintained by conscience. There, too, home and fireside are the centers of the noblest, sweetest life, the sure and safe foundation of a free, intelligent, powerful State.

Mr. President, no people more intelligently understands, more devotedly maintains, the basic principle of freedom to which their testimony is thus borne. They believe that upon it rest their peace and happiness. They will defend it, if need be, at any hazard. They as freely accord it to all.

We speak for no single class; we represent no creed; we court no favor, when, sir, from and for all the body of our good people, irrespective of race or opinion, my colleague and myself thus declare the sentiment which actuates our State, and supplement the action of its worthy governor in presenting to Congress the beautiful statue of James Marquette, in commemoration of his just renown and in illustration of the light and strength of liberty among men.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, the title of which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A resolution submitted by Mr. PEPPER providing for a committee of five Senators to investigate and report generally all the material facts and circumstances connected with the sale of United States bonds by the Secretary of the Treasury in the years 1894, 1895, and 1896.

Mr. PEPPER. I ask unanimous consent that the resolution may be laid aside informally.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered, without objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House insisted upon its amendments to the bill (S. 888) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Capital Railway Company," approved March 2, 1895; agreed to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. BABCOCK, Mr. CURTIS of Iowa, and Mr. RICHARDSON managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House insisted upon its amendments to the bill (S. 1904) relating to marriages in the District of Columbia; agreed to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. CURTIS of Iowa, Mr. ODELL, and Mr. COBB managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 5481) to restore the lands embraced in the Fort Lewis Military Reservation, in the State of Colorado, to the public domain;

A bill (H. R. 6298) to correct the military record of Charles K. Jenree, etc.;

A bill (H. R. 6431) to pay Peter P. Ferguson $1,765;

A bill (H. R. 6739) for the relief of John N. Quackenbush, late a commander in the United States Navy;

A bill (H. R. 7143) granting to the Soldiers and Sailors' Monument Association, of the county of Middlesex, in the State of New Jersey, 4 condemned cannon and 30 cannon balls;

A bill (H. R. 8266) donating two condemned cannon to Custer Post, No. 38, Grand Army of the Republic, of Etna, Pa., and two condemned cannon to James G. Clark Post, No. 162, Grand Army of the Republic, of Allegheny, Pa.; and

A bill (H. R. 8371) relating to pensions.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE. Now, let the appropriation bill be proceeded with. The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7542) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. QUAY to the amendment of Mr. GORMAN.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I do not intend to enter into any general discussion of the financial question on the naval appropriation bill, but inasmuch as the question of our revenues was discussed on both sides of the Chamber yesterday, I feel at liberty as a member of the Committee on Appropriations and as such somewhat responsible for the character of the appropriations, to express some dissent from the utterances perhaps on both sides of the Chamber with reference to this question.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] during the whole of this session, whenever he has spoken upon this question at all, has insisted that the only trouble in this country is from a lack of revenue. He opened up the discussion early in the campaign by a declaration in a very able speech that all we needed at this time was more revenue; that if we had more revenue the country would be in a state of peace, order, and prosperity. Yesterday the Senator again reiterated his anxiety for more revenue, and complained that the Democratic minority in this Senate—for no political party has a majority here—had not come to the rescue of the Republican minority for the purpose of securing needed revenue. In all these discussions the Senator has sought to make the public believe that the most objectionable feature of this Administration, the issue of bonds in time of peace, has grown out of the necessity for more revenue. I find in the public press of the country a very general disposition to attribute the issue of these bonds, amounting to $262,000,000, to a lack of revenue. Particularly is this true of the party to which I am attached. All their public statements, and as a rule the statements of the Eastern press, have approved of the issue of bonds, and have excused it on the ground that it was necessary because there was not sufficient revenue; and, of course, they come back to the charge against the Democratic party, that it is responsible because the revenue is deficient.

Mr. President, before I go into the question whether these bonds have been issued because of a lack of revenue, I want to go back to 1890, when the Democratic party was not responsible for legislation and the Republican party was. We passed then what has been known as the McKinley law, a law which seems just now to be in great favor and very popular, although, I believe, it cost us the following election.

The McKinley law did not provide a sufficiency of revenue; everybody knows that it did not, and I think it but fair and honest to say that if there had been no change of Administration there would still have been a deficiency of revenue under that law. The condition of the country was such that it was impossible that there should not have been a deficiency. In each of the four months preceding the incoming Administration of Mr. Cleveland there was a deficiency in the Government receipts amounting on an average to over a million dollars a month, and we got through with that fiscal year, which ended in June, 1893, with a surplus of $2,300,000.

Then came what is known as the panic of 1893, in which the consumption and consequently the importation of foreign products fell off, which, of course, produced a falling off in the revenues. It must be borne in mind, which the Senator from Ohio never stated, I believe, until yesterday, that from the time that this Administration came into power, and before they had had an opportunity to do the damage that we on our side recognize that they did in the passage of the Wilson-Gorman law—there had been a failure of revenue in nearly every month after the Administration came in. If there was any month in which there was not a deficiency, it was in the first months in which the Administration took office.

Mr. President, that is a condition which ought not to exist. I do not think, however, that this Senate is properly subject to the castigation which the Senator from Ohio gives it when he says that it is a disgrace to the Senate that there is not more revenue. The question whether we need more revenue now—that is, a new levy, a new order of duties—will depend upon various things and circumstances. I am of opinion myself, and I believe it can be thoroughly demonstrated, that the present tariff law will produce as much revenue as will be needed whenever prosperity comes to this country.

No revenue law, no collection of imports, which is fairly levied, fairly laid, and fairly collected, will bring to this country a sufficient income until conditions change, and the people are ready to buy and consume. That is the first subject to which the statesmen of this country should direct their attention; that is the first thing which is absolutely essential and necessary. We must bring back to this country the prosperity which formerly existed and ought still to exist in this country.

I know, Mr. President, that as a Republican it may be considered to be my duty from a partisan standpoint to insist that the lack of prosperity is the result of a Democratic Administration. I do not so believe.

I do not approve of the Wilson-Gorman Act. I think it is an inartistic measure; but I think in many respects it carries as much duty upon articles of import as any law ever should carry. I said when that measure was pending in the Senate that there were duties levied by that bill so large that if it had been proposed by a Republican House or a Republican Senate I should myself, as a protectionist, have voted to reduce them. That law is an unfair one in many respects. It is unfair in this, that it does not equitably distribute the burdens and does not equitably distribute the advantages which arise under a tariff law. One of the great industries in the State which I represent, the wool industry, is entirely ignored by that law.

When we came here in December, Mr. President, we came with exactly the same knowledge we have to-day of the political situation. We knew that no party in this Chamber had a majority; we knew that the country was divided into three political organizations, and that each organization had a number of Senators here, and that neither of the old organizations of itself could control the action of the Senate. We knew more than that. We knew that it was utterly impossible to secure any legislation with reference to the tariff question upon Republican lines. We knew very well that if we could induce a majority in this Chamber to vote for a measure of Republican character it could not be enacted into law. The rules of the Senate forbid that I should go into any expression of certainty as to why we knew it, but I appeal now to the Senate whether there is any reason in the world to suppose that if the Dingley bill had received a majority of the votes of the Senate it would have become a law.

Mr. President, on a former occasion I stated that I should attempt to show some time before the Senate adjourned that it was not intended that the Dingley bill should become a law, and to that point I will address myself now for only a moment or two. I have stated the difficulty; I have stated what every intelligent man knew was the condition. Was there any reason why any sane man should have believed that a measure proposing increased duties upon the Wilson-Gorman tariff act could ever have become a law with the present condition in the executive department and in the legislative department of the Government? It has been said that there was a dicker made, and that there was some underhand trick or method by which the bill was to become a law; that in consideration of some concessions to be made somewhere and by somebody—and nobody has ever been willing to state where or by whom—there could be such a friendly relation brought about between the two organizations in this Chamber that the bill might become a law. No man has yet been willing to father that statement. No man in this country has been willing to admit that the Senate of the United States or the Executive, or a branch or part of either, has been dickering with reference to the question of finance and revenue. There was no occasion for such a statement except by those who wanted to deceive the public as to the purpose and intention of the introduction of the bill in the House of Representatives. There was not a member who voted for that bill who did not know there were a hundred chances to one that it would never become a law. The majority of the men who voted for the bill either here or elsewhere did not desire that it should become a law.

If the Dingley bill should become a law to-day I should like to ask the friends of the measure what particular grounds they would have on which to make the coming campaign. They have endeavored, with a zeal and an intelligence which are, I suppose, to be commended—because zeal and intelligence are always said to be commendable, even though sometimes they are used for a bad purpose—to get rid of the great question, the financial question, and to bring and keep to the front before the public the question of tariff and tariff alone. The bill came to us from the House of Representatives after only two hours of discussion. It came into the Senate and went to a committee that was known to be, if not hostile, at least indifferent to it. It came to a Senate where to secure its passage it was necessary, if every Republican in the Chamber voted for it, that at least one member of the opposition should also vote for it. It came here with a certainty that no Democrat would vote for it. It came with practically a certainty that no Populist would vote for it. Yet we are told that it was expected that the bill would pass and would give to the people of the country the relief that they are demanding all over the land—that it would start up our paralyzed industries and bring prosperity.

I shall not expose any secrets of caucus or party arrangements, but I can say here without doing so that not a single Republican on this side of the Chamber who professes now to be so zealously for the bill ever attempted to secure by his solicitation or argument or persuasion any vote for the bill save those of the Republicans in this Chamber, which we all knew were impotent to pass it. The bill came here with the certain knowledge that it was objectionable as a tariff bill to a considerable portion of this side of the Chamber. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] said yesterday that it is not such a bill as he would vote for except in a case of emergency. If the public press is to be believed, it is such a bill as the Senator from Ohio in a public speech last fall declared to the people of his State he never would support; for if the press can be relied on, the Senator said that he would never support a tariff bill which did not take proper care of the wool industry of this country. After the speeches made by the two Senators from Montana the Senator will not pretend that the bill proposes to take care of the wool industry either of his State or of mine; and there is not an intelligent woolgrower in the United States who does not know that he will be practically as well off without the bill as with it.

Mr. President, we were furthermore told—I need not say where—that it was our duty to vote for the bill as it came from the House. We were told it would be rank heresy to our party if we should attempt to amend it. Who has the right, who has the power, to determine my relation to my political organization because of my objection to a bill which the Senator from Ohio on two or three occasions has declared in this Chamber is not a Republican measure and is not a partisan measure; as he says, a bill that nobody is obliged to vote for because he is a Republican and because he is in favor of the protective system? No effort was made to amend it. It was known here that with a slight amendment, not including any provision for silver coinage, at least one member of the opposition, called the Populists, could have been induced to vote for the bill. It was known, too, to Senators who had the bill in charge, and who talk so much about the necessity of passing it, that that vote could be secured by certain concessions, and it was not known then that others would object if such concessions were made. Yet no effort was made to secure this vote. Nobody attempted to secure it. Nobody cared, I may say, whether the bill passed or not. It had been introduced for a purpose. It had been introduced to attract the attention of the people of the United States from the currency question and to attract it to the tariff question. I may say, without violating any secrecy or any faith, that it was practically publicly proclaimed that the bill was not expected to become a law, but that it was expected to make an issue for the coming campaign, to put the case before the people where they would see that the great controversy was on the question as to import duties and not as to finance.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], on the 25th of February, in a speech in this Chamber in which he said the necessity was for more revenue, and that it could only be secured by a tariff, announced his willingness to vote for a tax upon tea and coffee. So very strenuous was he then to secure more revenue that he was willing to vote for a tax upon tea and coffee, and he said the people of the United States would cheerfully pay such a duty. Yesterday, when the Senator from Ohio was asked by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] whether he would favor a tax on tea and coffee, he declared that he would not. That I may not be wrong in the matter, I will read what the Senator said on that subject on the 25th of February. He said:

Mr. President, as a member of the Committee on Finance I disclaim all partisan feeling in respect to the bill which the Senator from Vermont moves to bring before the Senate. That bill does not belong to any party; it is not the representative of any party. The only merit in the bill is that it proposes to furnish $40,000,000 of revenue for the support of the Government, enough to meet the current expenses of the Government. I do not think anyone can claim that that bill is a Republican measure, or that it is to be voted for by anyone on that ground, or that it has any merit whatever except the fact that it would relieve the Treasury from the deficiency now occurring and accruing and increasing every day. It is a bill prepared for an occasion not a political one. The gentleman who prepared that bill in the House of Representatives did it in order to secure revenue for the support of the Government. I say now, Mr. President, I shall vote for any tax whatever which may be proposed by anybody, whether Democrat, Populist, or Republican, which shall supply sufficient revenue for the support of the Government.

It is a disgrace to our civilization, it is a disgrace to the country itself, that we are now expending $30,000,000 a year more than the receipts of the Government, and that Congress, now in session, with both Houses fully armed with power to furnish the revenue, is idle and refuses to act.

I will vote for a tax on tea, on coffee, on anything, in order to meet this deficiency, and I say that if the present Congress does adjourn in the face of the declarations now made to us, of the official reports sent to us, of the statements made by the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Treasury, that we are now going on day by day like a careless spendthrift to involve the country in debt, selling bonds when it is the duty of Congress at once to supply the revenue—

I wish to call the attention of the Senate to that statement because the Senator from Ohio, whenever there has been debate on this question, upon every occasion, not only then, but yesterday, has spoken ex cathedra as if the whole question would be settled by increasing the revenue; that we would avoid the necessity of selling bonds if we had more revenue. He said practically the same thing yesterday. The Senator from Ohio has been Secretary of the Treasury; he has been connected with one of the most important transactions financially in this country, in the funding of the debt and the resumption of specie payments, and his words that go out, whether measured or unmeasured, whether correct or incorrect, go to thousands of people with convictions of their truth. There are plenty of people in the United States who are believing to-day that all our misfortunes, all our distress, all our depreciation, the lack of enterprise and progress, are simply the result of a failure to secure a sufficient amount of revenue, and that transactions of which we have spoken heretofore, which have not been creditable to the Government or to the nation, the selling of bonds in time of peace, were due to the one fact that we lacked revenue.

The Senator from Ohio further said on that occasion that "a tax on tea and coffee would be paid cheerfully by the people of the United States."

If the Senator from Ohio had desired a tax on tea and coffee he, as a member of the Committee on Finance when the bill was before it, could easily, I have no doubt, have secured a tax on those articles. He might not have found on this side of the Chamber so much support as he would have found on the other side, because a tax on tea and coffee is a pure revenue tax; but he ought to have found as much support as he would have found on this side for a measure to tax sugar, because tea and coffee are not anywhere near so necessary to the comfort and the health of the people as is sugar. And yet we maintained in the country for many years a tax of 2 cents a pound upon sugar; and if we were in extremity, if we were where we had to have more revenue from import duties, I do not suppose there is a patriotic man anywhere who would decline to put a tax upon tea, upon coffee, or upon sugar. But I have yet to learn that the Senator from Ohio, or anybody else who is as anxious as he is for the passage of the bill simply, as he says, to secure revenue and that only, has ever proposed any other system of obtaining revenue than by import duties.

How does the Senator from Ohio expect by increasing the duties upon imports, and thus keeping them out of the country, to increase the revenues of the country? The trouble is that not enough imports are coming in to keep up the revenues. The Senator from Ohio says the way to get more revenue is to put on additional taxes and have less imports come in. I agree with him as to the wisdom of fewer imports. I do not wish to see this country flooded with foreign imports. I should be glad myself to see the imports decrease. I should be glad myself to see some other method of raising revenue adopted. There are many ways in which we could get the revenue. We could get it by a tax upon beer. We could get it by a number of methods that would not have brought into this Chamber a conflict between the two parties, which are divided upon the question of protection and nonprotection. The Senator can not say that we did not have the committee. We did have the committee practically. I will admit that only one-half of the committee consider themselves attached to the Republican party, but at least one member of the committee has always stood for the protective system in this Chamber, and because of his non-attachment to the Republican party just now there is no reason to suppose from any act of his, from any word that he has ever uttered, that he is not so much attached to the protective system as he ever has been. But if in the committee it had been suggested to the Democratic side of the committee that there was a necessity for more revenue, and that that revenue should be collected by a nonpartisan course, that that revenue should be collected because of the emergency, because of the necessity, in such way that both sides of the Chamber might get together, then it would have been time enough for him to berate the Senate when the proposition was rejected.

No such effort was made, for the simple reason, as I have stated, that nobody desired the passage of the bill at the time; and there are men in this Chamber, and outside of it particularly, who have been fearful that the bill might become a law. It might possibly, if it become a law, shatter the expectation of some Presidential candidate, and it would certainly take from the party to which I belong one of the great weapons with which it means to attack the Democracy during the coming campaign—the necessity for a change of the tariff—for two purposes; first, for protection; and secondly, for revenue.

The bill proposed to raise the duties on carpets of one class 2½ per cent above the McKinley Act; to raise the tariff 15 per cent on cottons, when it was said here on this floor, by the representative of the cotton interest, that the cotton schedule of the Wilson-Gorman bill was the best schedule and the best tariff for cotton that had ever been made; to increase by 15 per cent the duties upon steel and iron, when the representatives of the steel and iron industries in this country declared that the Wilson-Gorman Act had given them all they desired, or all they wished. If the Dingley bill were a law, the Republican party would be without an issue, and could not attempt to make the fight on this issue. They would have to take some other issue to avoid meeting the one which the people desire they shall meet, and that is the financial question as distinguished from the revenue question. They still might have promised us a duty on wool, and tried thereby to hold us in the West in line. They would not have had much else to promise, except, perhaps, an increase on woolen goods.

The trouble with the duty on woolen goods is not that it is too high or too low, but that Europe is in a condition where she can manufacture and must manufacture cheap goods. She has large foreign markets. She has large markets other than ours, and when the conditions here invited her imports she put her goods at such low rates that no American manufacturer, paying American wages, could compete with her. The foreign manufacturers are putting their goods at a price which is less than profitable, if the statements made in Europe are true. They are sending us goods which they manufacture with their cheap labor and which are not required for the other markets. No tariff that you could put on goods would probably meet that condition.

There would be nothing, I repeat, for the Republican party to make a campaign on with the tariff issue out of the way. The party could not then probably avoid the financial question. But if it can make the tariff the question, as it has evidently been doing, if it can by repeated declarations through the public press and by its Senators on this floor, like the Senator from Ohio, who have largely the public ear, I will admit, make the people believe that after all the only question before the American people is one of proper import duties, then the sailing will be clear and plain. I think myself any nation that goes along and fails to provide for its expenditures and relies upon borrowing money for the purpose of keeping up its expenses is certainly unwise. But it might not be wise always to increase revenue. There may be circumstances such as would excuse a nation from attempting to increase its revenue. If the Secretary of the Treasury is correct when he says that when prosperity returns to the country and business revives the revenue will be equal to expenditures, it would not be wise to put an extra tax on the people, it would not be wise to tax tea or coffee or sugar, or put extra import duties on woollens or anything else, if it were only with a view of raising revenue.

I wish to say a word or two on the question of protection, for fear I may be misunderstood. I am a protectionist. I believe in protecting American labor and American industries. I do not believe in protecting them in a way that shall give to the manufacturer an opportunity to unduly charge. I would so regulate the duties as to equalize the labor prices in this country and in Europe, and when that is done nobody ought to find any fault. If that is done you will have as much revenue as you need ordinarily when times are good and consumption is at a normal rate.

Mr. President, do we need the additional revenue? On a former occasion, on the 25th of February, the Senator from Ohio made a speech from which I have read an extract, and he means now, as he meant then, that the public shall understand that the sale of bonds in this country was necessitated because of lack of revenue. He yesterday said the same thing in substance. I think I can turn to it. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] inquired of the Senator from Ohio whether he would vote for a duty on tea and coffee. I suppose the revenue question is not nearly so important as it was on the 25th day of February, or else the Senator has hopes of raising revenue by some other method which he did not then have, for he then said he would vote for a tariff upon anything, it did not make any difference what. He specifically declared his willingness to vote for a tax on tea and coffee. But yesterday he said:

No; I would not, for I would not throw the whole burden of taxation upon those who consume tea and coffee.

It would not be fair or just to do it. But I am willing to take up the bill and provide for raising the requisite taxation from foreign goods to carry on the operation of the Government and place us beyond the danger of a deficiency every year and the sale of bonds every six months.

There is nobody in this Chamber, there is nobody in this country who knows better than the Senator from Ohio that the sale of not a dollar of bonds was necessitated by lack of revenue. We have not sold bonds when anybody could pretend that we were in danger of not being able to meet our obligations. We have sold bonds with a full Treasury. We have sold bonds with more than any other nation in the world can show to its credit. There has been no time, so says the President, that it was necessary to sell bonds. I will read what the President of the United States has said upon this subject. In the President's annual message he said:

In the present stage of our difficulty it is not easy to understand how the amount of our revenue receipts directly affects it.

Speaking of the financial condition:

The important question is not the quantity of money received in revenue payments, but the kind of money we maintain and our ability to continue in sound financial condition. We are considering the Government's holdings of gold as related to the soundness of our money and as affecting our national credit and monetary strength.

I need not read it all. He says further on:

It can not, therefore, be safe to rely upon increased revenues as a cure for our present troubles.

It is possible that the suggestion of increased revenue as a remedy for the difficulties we are considering may have originated in an intimation or distinct allegation that the bonds which have been issued ostensibly to replenish our gold reserve were really issued to supply insufficient revenue. Nothing can be further from the truth.

Bonds were issued to obtain gold for the maintenance of our national credit. As has been shown, the gold thus obtained has been drawn again from the Treasury upon United States notes and Treasury notes.

Skipping—I need not read it all—

At no time when bonds have been issued has there been any consideration of the question of paying the expenses of Government with their proceeds.

Here is the declaration of the President of the United States that at no time when bonds have been issued have they been necessitated by the lack of money.

The Secretary of the Treasury comes with his report and makes the same statement. In February the Government of the United States issued $100,000,000 of bonds.

The cash balance in the Treasury on the 1st day of December, 1895, was $177,406,346.62, being $38,072,420.30 in excess of actual gold reserve on that day.

The Secretary says:

While the situation does not require any legislation for raising additional revenue by taxation at this time, it is such as to require the strictest economy in appropriations and public expenditures.

Mr. President, that is a condition that must always exist in this country. I think that is a condition that always has existed. That is an obligation that has rested upon every man connected with this body and the other—"strict economy in appropriations and public expenditures."

The Secretary proceeds:

With a complete return to the normal business conditions of the country, and a proper legislative and executive supervision over expenditures, the revenue laws now in force will, in my opinion, yield ample means for the support of the public service upon the basis now established, and upon the assumption, which seems to be justified, that the progress now being made toward the restoration of our usual state of prosperity will continue without serious interruption.

And so on.

I do not know what the deficiency is going to be this year, but I do know that the deficiencies on the 28th day of April for the year were $24,247,517.83. On that day we had $273,522,338 in the Treasury. I repeat, there is not a nation on the face of the earth that holds $273,000,000 in its Treasury for ordinary purposes. If there is such a nation at all it is Russia, that is stated to have accumulated a large amount, nobody knows how much, for war purposes—not to be used except in case of an emergency for war. There is more money in the Treasury than the people of the United States are willing should be put there and there tied up. Every dollar of money that is put into the Treasury comes out of the circulation that is necessary in this country to maintain even the present bad conditions of commerce and trade. Inside of twenty-seven months you have put into the Treasury $200,000,000 that had been in circulation. You drew out of the circulation of this country $200,000,000 and put it where it is of no more value to commerce and trade than it would be if it were in the depths of the sea.

And yet, Mr. President, Senators rise here and wonder why it is that business does not revive, why it is that prosperity does not come to us. We have had contraction at the rate of $100,000,000 a year, contraction since the 1st of February this year of $100,000,000, apparently in ignorance of a well-known and well-settled principle of political economy, that when you decrease the circulation of the money you destroy prices and you discourage enterprise and retard all movements toward production.

Mr. President, if there ever was a nation in the world that seems to be governed by imbeciles and men without thought or men without reason, it is fair to say we are now in the hands of that class of people. The history of the world does not show such contraction as we have voluntarily and deliberately and willingly taken it upon ourselves to create for the simple purpose of maintaining the gold standard, and nothing else.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] knows, and every man in this Chamber knows, that the $262,000,000 is a debt put upon this country to maintain the gold standard. And he knows, as I know, that the $262,000,000 is but the beginning of a debt that is to be put upon us if the gold standard is to be maintained. It will not do for the Senator to tell me or anybody else in this Chamber that revenue is what you want. What you want, Mr. President, is some system of finance that shall bring confidence to the people who create and produce, that shall encourage them in the belief that when they manufacture an article they want to sell they can sell it for as much at least as it cost. The absolute certainty exists to-day in every productive circle in the United States, and pretty nearly in the world, that he who produces to-day must sell to-morrow at a loss.

Mr. President, the financial question is at the bottom of this trouble, not a lack of revenues. I do not intend myself to allow either the Senator from Ohio or anybody else to fool the people of this country with the idea that all you need is to pass the McKinley bill again, and that then prosperity will come. You will never see the McKinley bill reenacted, and if you did you would not see prosperity come from it. We have been promised all these years that if we would do this and if we would do the other thing prosperity would be at our door. Every promise made has failed.

I know that there is traversing the country and shouting a band of men who have labeled their candidate "the advance agent of prosperity." Mr. President, the people who look to him as the savior will find that they have been deluded and deceived. The agent of prosperity is not in sight, and he will not come into sight until this system of finance of ours is changed; until we return to the system which gave the people the agencies to do business with, so that we shall satisfy them that when they put their money in an enterprise and produce articles they may reap reward and advantage therefrom.

Mr. President, I said I would not enter into a general discussion of the silver question, and I do not intend to do so. I should not have made any remarks at all on the pending bill but for the statement made yesterday by the Senator from Ohio that I thought needed a challenge, and I have challenged it. Of course the Senator from Ohio may say that all you need is to pass the tariff bill and prosperity will come. I can only answer that, in my judgment, we are not suffering for want of more tariff. We are suffering for want of two things in this country. One is that the par of exchange between the silver-using countries and this country shall be reestablished; and the other, that the people may know that as business proceeds and grows the Government of the United States, either by an open mint or by some system of issuing paper money or some other method, will keep pace with the growth of commerce in its issue of currency.

Mr. President, there is one rule that has been observed in all commercial countries everywhere for all time, and that is that as the business of the country increases so the currency of the country must increase in proportion. Here we are with 70,000,000 people, the richest nation on the earth, with more natural advantages, with more intelligence, with more ambition, with more enterprise than any other nation without exception, and we are sitting here and watching the currency shrink and shrivel at the rate of $100,000,000 a year, while we witness the increase of population of the country at a rate of 10,000,000 at least in a decade, and no provision made by which the people can secure additional means of doing business unless the national banks shall, in their generosity, come to our relief and issue more paper money.

The national banks will not do it. The representatives of the national banks met in a bankers' convention at Baltimore two years ago. All the wisdom of the banking interests of this country was represented there, and they assume that they have all the financial wisdom there is. They appointed a committee, and their committee reported to the convention a system for the reorganization of national banks. I think I may say that the entire metropolitan press of the country approved of it because it came from a bankers' convention. I should say that the convention was held some time in the latter part of the summer, and in December we received a message from the President of the United States indorsing it. A month later we received another message from the President—I will not say it was exactly a month, but it was later—in which the President rather indicated that he had not perhaps thought as much about the system as he ought, and he believed, after all, it would not answer the purpose for which it was proposed. In the course of the next ninety days there was not a man anywhere so ignorant in this country as to defend that national banking system of the Baltimore convention. You could not find a banker who would do it, you could not find an authority upon banking who would do it. They absolutely abandoned it, and up to the present hour the bankers have had no system of reorganization whatever.

So we need not expect to look to the bankers to furnish us the money. They have $262,000,000 of bonds that they can bank on if they choose, and yet we see that no banking paper is being issued; that is, none in excess of what was heretofore issued. We are simply going along increasing our commerce, increasing our trade, because we must do so by virtue of increased population, and we are making no arrangements whatever to give the people a proper currency to keep pace with the growth of the population and business.

Mr. President, I have myself an idea that there is a method by which we can relieve the people of this country. I do not know that I am correct. I will not insist that I am infallible upon the question. I may be in error. In my anxiety that the people should have some opportunity of recovering their standing, restoring the industries, bringing back prices where they ought to be brought, it is possible that I have thought so much of it and have been so anxious about it that my judgment may not be good. But in my judgment there is no one who has proposed any system in this country that will save this people except that of the free coinage of silver.

The President of the United States said that he wanted to retire the greenbacks. The Senator from Ohio said on this floor that that would not do. The President of the United States wanted to meet the crisis in financial affairs by a further and a greater contraction of the currency. The Senator from Ohio was not willing to go to that extent and he said it ought not to be done. But yet the Senator said they ought to pile up the notes in the Treasury and keep them out of circulation. I believe the Senator from Ohio proposed in this Chamber that $100,000,000 of them should at all times be locked up in the Treasury and kept there—a permanent contraction.

That brings me down to the question of appropriations. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] complains that we have put in this bill too many battle ships, and he has an amendment pending to reduce the number from four to two. I think the number in the bill is ample, but not too many. For myself I have always voted for reasonable appropriations for the defense of the country. Living as I do in a part of the country where no hostile foot can ever tread, I have never failed to vote the most liberal appropriations for the defense of the coasts and the commerce of this land, and I shall continue to vote such appropriations until it shall appear that we are too poor to make them. And I believe as I stand here that the time will come, if we pursue the present financial system, when the people of this country will be too poor to make a gallant defense of their flag.

Mr. President, I hope that when that time comes I will not be here to look upon the flag. But it will come unless we reform our financial system. There is no system that touches the people like the monetary system—the system affecting the currency and the use of money. A distinguished French writer once said that "false political economy, false ideas on economic questions incorporated into the administration of public affairs have caused to the people of the world more suffering, more anguish than all the wars, than all the pestilence, than all the famine that ever afflicted the human race." He might have said with truth, and gone to history for his vindication, that false political economy has brought about nearly all the great wars of ancient and modern times.

People tell us you can not legislate prosperity. Mr. President, prosperity only comes by wise and prudent legislation. The currency question comes home to every man, and when we adopt a false system of finance, a system that will make the great masses poor and the few rich, we are entering upon an era when we shall not dare to stand before the world and defend our flag or our honor, because we shall be afraid of the consequences which may flow from it.

We saw, when the President of the United States sent here a message that awoke for a little while the patriotic impulses of the people of the United States, the fright that took possession of the capitalists of the country, who put ahead of the honor and the dignity of the country the question of dollars and cents, and from the great commercial centers every one of us began to receive urgent messages "to not disturb the trade and the traffic of the country." You do not disturb the trade and traffic of the country by standing by your flag, by vindicating the honor and the credit of the United States. I do not care about pursuing that further. I might say with reference to those people who put dollars and cents above sentiment, as they term it, and above patriotism, things that might sound unkind and unjust, but I shall leave that now.

Mr. President, I am concerned, I freely admit, for the future of my country. I have stood in this Chamber and defended what I believe to be a correct monetary system, not because the people of my State produce silver, not because the people of my State are locally interested, but because I believe that the peace and prosperity, the morality and the religion of this country are dependent upon a sound and proper financial system. I do not believe you can have patriotism and love of country while the people are in distress. Empty stomachs do not make patriots; destitute homes do not make liberty-loving men. No nation can maintain its freedom and its independence if it does not have as the substratum for its people to stand on prosperity, not to a few, but to all. The system now in vogue is one calculated to make the rich richer and the poor poorer. I do not intend to go into details; I do not intend to cite, as I could, statistics to show that the great laboring mass, the twenty-odd millions of men who till the soil, are practically tilling it to-day without profit. They are farming, as was said of the English farmer by an Englishman not long since, for a bare subsistence.

The Senator from Ohio a short time since congratulated the Senate and the country that this heresy, as he called it, of silver was at an end; and he told us then that the Republican party would adopt a gold-standard platform, or words to that effect, and put itself on the gold-standard plan. Mr. President, I want to tell the Senator from Ohio that I can not say what the Republican party will do; but it does look to me as if the time had come when the Republican party, which has been closer to the masses than any political party which was ever organized, a political party which was organized in the interest of the human race, a party that grew up to defend human liberty and human rights, that went into its first great campaign inscribing on its banner "Free soil and free men"—it does look as if the time had come when the party had reached the point where it is about to drop its interest in the masses and follow the bidding and become the tool and agent of those who have no interest in the great body of mankind, whose sympathies never go out to the people, but are always with the dollars and cents.

Not long ago the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] rather indicated that a few of us on this floor were not Republicans because of our votes on the tariff. I resented the insinuation then as I resent it now. I am a Republican in the truest and best sense. I am a Republican who believes in the old tenets, the old faith. Mr. President, I helped to create the Republican party. I was in it before the Senator from Vermont, and I did not go into it, as he did, out of a dying and decaying party. I left the strong, aggressive Democratic forces when I entered into the Republican party. And I say to the Senator that I came into that party voluntarily; he must allow me to go out of it in the way I came in. He can not fix my line of conduct any more than a Democratic or Republican convention can command my conscience and my judgment.

The times do not indicate prosperity; the times do not indicate peaceful conditions among the people; the times, I think, on the contrary, indicate a dissolution largely of present political organizations, and ultimately, I believe, a re-forming of political lines.

The Senator from Ohio says that the silver question is dead. A few days after that declaration was made he might have seen the British Parliament declaring by resolution that it was to the interest of the English people to bring back the rate of exchange and to restore the parity that no longer exists between the gold-standard and silver-standard countries. He might have seen a gathering a few days since, in one of the great capitals of Europe, of the very best thought of the world, without exception, in the interest of silver. I regret that I have not here a letter which I received the other day from the most distinguished writer of political economy in this country and whose reputation is world-wide. I meant to bring it here and read it to the Senate; I meant to put it against the Senator's declaration that the silver cause is dead, but I have forgotten to bring it. This writer of whom I speak is not a free-coinage man. He does not believe, as I believe, in the United States being able alone to solve this question, but he does believe, as I believe, that this question of bimetallicism, as he puts it, "of international bimetallicism," is the cause of civilization; and I ask permission to insert the entire letter as an appendix to my speech.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, in my judgment this question is the cause of civilization. I believe as firmly as I believe I am here that the welfare of mankind is bound up in a proper solution of this question. I believe that you are now facing the greatest danger which Christendom has ever faced. I believe we stand in the face of "the Asiatic peril," as it has been properly called, from the hordes of Asia with their cheap labor, with their ingenuity, with their ability to live upon food upon which we could not exist, who will become the active competitors with our laborers all over this country and those of Europe as well. No student of history can fail to see where we shall go. It is not a question of supposition; it is a question of certainty. We can not compete with them. Talk about tariffs! Talk about the paltry per cent that you have been able to put upon American manufactures keeping out from our competition the products of China and Japan and India! Mr. President, it can not be done. You are giving them now a bounty of nearly 100 per cent, and you can not start even until you restore the rates of exchange; and you can only do that by making silver and gold equal at some rate fixed by law.

I am not easily frightened. I have taken up this question with care, and I have studied it as becomes me and as it becomes you to study it. I can see the 400,000,000 of Chinamen—a great, stalwart people, with a civilization which we despise, but a civilization better fitted for production by a hundred per cent than ours, with a civilization of which the burdens are nothing compared with the burdens of our civilization; a people trained by thousands of years of industry and deprivation; a people who go to death with the same composure that they go to the table; a people who will live in huts and sleep in dungeons, and who practically despise the comforts that we must of necessity have—I can see them, I say, marching forward in their battle of industry to the astonishment and injury of the civilized world. It was said not long since by a writer that in this country and Europe we labor for the comforts of life; in those countries they labor for the necessities of life.

More than one-half of the whole population of the globe is being stimulated into industry and into activity by our baneful system of finance, and we shall build up in the Asiatic countries manufactures to such an extent that, when once they are created, they can not be destroyed. I see the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] sitting in front of me. Recently from his State capital went to Japan to manufacture straw mats. Capital has gone from England to all the Chinese ports where Europeans are allowed to live, and the Chinamen themselves are building great manufacturing establishments to compete with American and European laborers. Do not let any man tell me that he is anxious to preserve to the American laborer that system of wages which will give him fair compensation, and then knowingly vote for a system that gives to his competitors a bounty of 100 per cent.

We are told that we who would not vote to take up this non-descript bill, which the Senator himself says is no Republican measure, are not protectionists. The protection system has its greatest enemy in the gold-standard party. I say you can not maintain in this country both the gold-standard and the protective system; and if you do maintain it you can not destroy the competition of which I have spoken, which is being built up in Asiatic countries to compete with American labor.

If I desired to consume the time of the Senate I could produce the most alarming statements with reference to the growth of manufactures in China, Japan, and India; but I need not do so. The reports of our consuls, the English consular reports, and the French consular reports all tell the same story; but though one should rise from the dead and proclaim the truth, I have not any idea that it would change the minds of the average gold-standard advocates. They have heard this again and again, and they have shut their ears to it. As to those who believe in the doctrine that trade should be free as air, I do not wonder, but as to those who profess that they are in favor of protecting American labor and American capital, I can not conceive how they can see the growth of manufactures in Japan and China and India and in the silver countries of South America and Mexico without some perturbation and fear.

Mr. President, when I took the floor I did not intend to speak at length on this subject. I simply meant to say, in response to the statement of the Senator from Ohio, that there was an abundance of money in the Treasury, that there was no necessity for any increased revenue, and that it was better for the country that we should spend the money we have in the Treasury than that we should leave it there locked up. It would be better to-day if that $270,000,000 were afloat in the circles of commerce and trade than to have it there.

If we could but disabuse our minds of this foolish notion that we ought to keep in the Treasury a great amount of gold, so that those who want to export gold can get it without cost except its face or money value, we should take an important step in the right direction. We know very well if they go to the banks for gold they must pay something besides its face value. If we can but disabuse the authorities who hold the money of the idea that it is their duty to pay in gold, and if we compel them to pay in silver, which is a legal tender and which is as valuable as gold for every purpose in the world except that of export, then there would be an end of the necessity for gold in the Treasury, and if gold continues to be exported it will go from the banks and not from the United States Treasury.

Mr. President, I ask the indulgence of the Senate for having said so much. I have said it because I believed it was a duty on my part that I should. I believe that now is the time that every American citizen should take hold of this question, and if we are wrong let the fact be known. I believe that the American people as a people are decidedly in favor of the use of silver as money.

The Senator from Ohio, as I said, congratulated us on the death of silver. Since that time there have been great gatherings of the American people declaring for silver. True, they have been almost entirely composed of members of only one of the great political organizations, the Democratic party, which, with the exception of the New England States, has uniformly declared for the white metal.

When the lines are drawn during the coming summer, when the political organizations shall arrange themselves for battle, it may be that one of these great political parties which has been in existence for many years will be the champion of silver. If that should be the case, then every man will have an opportunity to put this silver question where he thinks it belongs. For myself, Mr. President, it belongs in the front of everything that we can desire. There is nothing which this nation can do, in my judgment, that would bring prosperity to the country so quickly and so surely as to open our mints to the free coinage of silver; there is nothing, in my judgment, that this great nation can do which will bring upon it such great disasters as to adhere to the gold standard.

I look with fear and trembling to see what that great political organization with which I have acted for forty years will do. Will it take the side of the masses? Will it take the side which I believe leads to prosperity? Will it take the side which will save to the thousands and tens of thousands of struggling men the homes they are bound to lose if we continue on the gold standard, or will it yield to this seductive, false, and lying idea of "sound money" and declare for the gold standard?

If the Republican party becomes the party of the gold-standard people, from the day that it so declares, in my judgment, its disintegration will begin.

I am often asked, Mr. President, what I will do if the political party with which I have been connected and to which I am attached and of whose record, on the whole, I am proud—what I will do if that party adopts the gold standard and puts itself in line with those who are demanding that gold, and gold alone, shall measure the value of the world. I have no hesitation in saying here, Mr. President, as I have said before, that whenever the political organization to which I belong ceases to represent my sentiments and my judgment on great and fundamental principles I shall cease to act with it. When the Democratic party, in which I had been brought up, in which I was educated, and to which I had an attachment growing out of the fact that my people had been members of it ever since it was organized, and because I had been taught to believe in its principles, became, as I believed, the party of oppression and wickedness, I got out of it and I went into the party which represented my views and my ideas, although it was then a weak and despised party.

Mr. President, I should despise myself, holding the views I do, if I should lift my hand to put in power any man who could from the Executive Chamber use the slightest influence to continue the existing system of finance. Holding, as I do, that the interest of the whole race is wrapped up in this question; that it is not only for our interest, but the interest of the world—for I believe all peoples are interested in it, and that if we do not restore the par of exchange between the gold-standard and the silver-using countries inside of a generation that we shall transform Christendom into Asiatic conditions and we shall put the laborers of Christendom under Asiatic pay as well as under Asiatic conditions—believing that, as I do, I should despise myself, as you ought to despise me, if I did not lift my voice against a system threatening such danger; and if I should lift my voice one way and vote another, you would have a right to accuse me of hypocrisy and deceit. As I speak, Mr. President, so shall I vote, in the interest, as I believe, of the great masses of men in this country; and in the interest, as I believe, of the great masses of men throughout Christendom. [Applause in the galleries.]

I present to the Senate two letters which I have received, which I should desire to go into the RECORD with my remarks but for the fact that both of them are, I think, a little too voluminous for that purpose. I should like, however, to have them published as a document. One of them is on the money question and is from a former member of Congress from the State of Ohio, well known to very many Senators here. It is an able letter, well written, temperate in tone and character. The other is a letter addressed to this ex-member of Congress by a very prominent business man in Ohio, a man, as I understand, of large wealth and high character. While there are some things in the letter to which I do not fully agree, yet the writer presents what he says is the condition of the country and what he thinks is the remedy, etc., and I think it is well worthy of perusal. I ask that the two letters may be printed together as a document.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Colorado? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

APPENDIX.

BOSTON, April 15, 1898.

DEAR SENATOR TELLER: Your letter of the 11th instant is received. I presume the words you quote from Mr. Moreton Frewen have reference to some extemporaneous remarks made by me in London in 1894, how closely reported I can not say. Perhaps if I were stating my views for publication I should put the matter differently, in order to avoid possible misconception and misconception; but if the words be taken as they were meant, I stand by them. By the "right settlement of the silver question" of course is meant the establishment of international bimetalism on a broad basis. I believe the benefits of such a system to the trade and industry of the world would be almost incalculable, so that hardly any cost or pains required to bring this result about should be considered too high a price. I believe that the nations have suffered to an enormous extent from the dislocation of international exchange—"the break of gauge"—which followed the monetary measures of 1873 and from the continuous appreciation of gold. I believe that these have been among the chief causes of the crises, panics, and hard times which have so strongly characterized the last twenty-three years. I am fully ready to repeat the statement that the cause of international bimetalism is the cause of civilization. The demonetization of silver was in the first instance a disastrous measure, and every step since taken in that direction has brought fresh evils. All intelligent monometallists now admit that universal gold monometallism is now impossible. The old bimetallic world is thus to be left permanently divided into two monometallic worlds, trade between which must be subject to incessant and often wide and violent fluctuations of exchange.

While holding these views, I believe that the United States have suffered far less from this cause and have a far smaller interest in the restoration of bimetalism than any country of Europe, and I am altogether opposed to any action of our Government alone.

Very truly, yours,

FRANCIS A. WALKER.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I may be expected, probably, through courtesy to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], to make some brief reply to the speech he has just made.

I know that the Senator from Colorado is an honest man; he has strong convictions, the strongest of all of which is that silver is the loadstone of prosperity. I always respect a man who stands up for his opinions, whether they be right or wrong. Most of the Senator's argument has been repeated to us before, and necessarily so, because the Senator has often spoken on this subject. He has said many things to which I should like to reply, but I do not care to do so except as to some few points.

The Senator believes that the free coinage of silver, which means a dollar worth 50 cents in gold, will be the salvation of the country. He says that at some time I boasted of the death of silver. I am not conscious of ever having made such a remark in my life. On the contrary, I claim that the policy which I have sought to pursue since the depreciation of silver has been to use more silver coin than was ever used before in our own country, and it is a significant fact that all the countries in the world in which gold is the standard—that is, all the countries of Europe, all of which are upon the same basis as we are, the gold standard—use more silver than ever before; but it is purchased at market price and coined at the old ratio and maintained at par with gold coin precisely as we do. Therefore, when it is attempted to prejudice the public mind and convey the impression that we who believe in the standard of gold and the use of silver to the largest extent possible are the enemies of silver it is a great mistake. That is a blind fact that ought not to be repeated, and it seems to me ought to be abandoned by my honorable friend.

The Senator said several things to which I wish very briefly to reply. He talked about the McKinley law as if all the Republicans on this side of the Chamber were committed to all the provisions of the McKinley law. There was a great deal of difference of opinion between the two Houses when that bill was pending. As it was framed in the House of Representatives and sent over here I believe it was a very good bill. After it was sent here it was greatly modified by the Senate. It might as well be called the McKinley-Allison-Aldrich bill as by any other name, for the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] probably had as active an influence and power in controlling the terms of that bill as anyone.

On the whole, the McKinley Act was a good measure. It was weakened, however, in my opinion, by the reciprocity clauses, but not, however, in the opinion generally of those who voted for it. I believe the reciprocity clauses which were added to the McKinley bill in the Senate tended to weaken it as a revenue measure, and that the results of all the treaties and agreements made for reciprocal exchange of products on special terms between the United States and other countries ended in a loss of revenue. Still, in spite of all, the McKinley law would undoubtedly have furnished enough money to carry on the ordinary operations of the Government but for the election of Mr. Cleveland and the events that followed. As a matter of course, the McKinley law was attacked during the Presidential contest of 1893. The Carnegie strikes and financial stringency weakened the Republican party. The result was that Mr. Cleveland was elected President.

The very fact that the Democratic party came into power in the executive branch and in the two Houses of Congress was a threat against the McKinley law, a declaration that it would be changed, and therefore at once importations under the McKinley law largely fell off. But in spite of it all the McKinley law, which has been so much condemned, did furnish enough money to carry on the operations of the Government, with the aid of the internal-revenue laws. After the close of the Administration of General Harrison, at the end of the fiscal year on the 1st day of July, 1893, some five or six months after the incoming of the present Administration, when Mr. Cleveland was President, there was a surplus in the revenue of over $2,000,000.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator from Ohio allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. Is it not a fact that in each of the months of November, December, January, and February preceding Mr. Cleveland's inauguration there was a deficiency?

Mr. SHERMAN. That may have been so—

Mr. TELLER. Amounting to over $4,000,000?

Mr. SHERMAN. The defeat of the Republican party and the certainty of the repeal of the McKinley Act would have produced that result. I have no doubt whatever that if the Republican party had prevailed in 1892 the McKinley law would have furnished ample revenue. That is my opinion.

As soon as Mr. Cleveland was elected his first idea was the repeal of the law for the purchase of 4,500,000 ounces of silver per month, commonly called the Sherman Act, a misnomer, I think, because I was the last man to agree to it, and have regretted it every moment since, because I honestly believed it was not wise to continue the purchase of silver. But in order to prevent the passage of a measure for the free coinage of silver, I finally yielded and voted for the bill with the rest of my associates. That is the history of that act.

But at that very time, while this matter was being discussed in the Senate and the House, the committee on the part of the House was framing a new tariff bill. The Wilson bill was then being framed, and in the following session it was sent to us. If that bill had become a law in the form in which it passed the House the deficiency in revenue would have been fully $100,000,000 a year. The honorable Senator from Maryland who spoke yesterday said that he and his associates here in the Senate added to the income upon what is called the Wilson Act some fifty or sixty million dollars. That was his statement. Even with that addition, in every hour and every day and every year there has been a deficiency in the revenue less than expenditures of thirty millions a year. The present condition of affairs grows out of the repeal of the McKinley Act and the passage of the Wilson-Gorman Act.

This did not at all present the question of the free coinage of silver, about which I shall have something to say hereafter. There are several fatal defects in the Wilson Act. The first and chief one in practical administration, as now stated even by Democratic officials, is the ad valorem principle which was adopted in levying duties upon imported goods. The ad valorem system has been found to be faulty in every country in the world where duties are imposed upon importations. You can not rely upon the prices stated in the invoices under the ad valorem system.

Mr. MILLS. Will the Senator from Ohio tell me, if he please, why they adopted the ad valorem system in the woolen schedule of the McKinley Act?

Mr. SHERMAN. There are certain classes of goods as to which the ad valorem system must be adopted.

Mr. MILLS. Ah!

Mr. SHERMAN. But wherever an article can be assessed by a specific duty it ought to be done.

Mr. FRYE. You had both as to woollens.

Mr. SHERMAN. I know we had both in woollens. On wool the duty was specific, so much a pound. On woollens, on account of the value varying 100, 200, and perhaps 500 per cent, it was necessary to have a compound of those duties. But the principle adopted in what is called the Wilson Act is the ad valorem system, and now the officers of the Government, Democrats all, claim and admit that the ad valorem system has led to great undervaluation and therefore to a large loss of revenue.

Mr. MILLS. The Senator from Ohio must recollect that his party always, in imposing duties on woolen goods, have declared that the specific tax on the woolen goods was simply to compensate for the tax on wool. Is not that true?

Mr. SHERMAN. No, sir; I do not think it is true.

Mr. MILLS. Oh, unquestionably.

Mr. SHERMAN. There never was an ad valorem tax on wool that I know of.

Mr. MILLS. It never has been denied anywhere, and that the ad valorem tax is on the manufactured goods for the benefit of the manufacturer.

Mr. SHERMAN. Where the duty can be specific, as in the case of wool, where it is levied by the pound, I think it should be fixed by a specific rate, but in the case of manufactured goods it is impossible to fix a specific duty, because they are so different in value. A piece of broadcloth of the finest quality would weigh far less than a coarser product, and yet it would be many times as valuable. In such a case an ad valorem rate is unavoidable. The two rates must be combined. But the general principle of ad valorem rates adopted in the Wilson Act has undoubtedly added to the deficiency of revenue.

Now, there is another matter. I do not want to go over these points very fully. We are told that the Dingley bill would not have been supported in the Senate. We could easily have passed the Dingley bill but for the omnipresent and omniscient question, in the eyes of some Senators, the free coinage of silver. When the bill went to the Committee on Finance, what was done with it? Was it considered in detail? No; simply because a majority of the committee were not only opposed to the tariff bill, but were in favor of the free coinage of silver. Then the unusual, I might almost say illegal, method was adopted of offering as an amendment or substitute for the tariff bill the provision for the free coinage of silver. Thus this omniscient silver head was thrust into a controversy where it was conceded on all hands that there was necessity for the increase of the revenues of the Government. Who did that? I am not here to complain. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] to whom I am replying voted with the rest, there being several on this side of the Chamber, with the Democrats also. What I have always claimed and what I now claim is that the Democratic Senators who believe with me that it is not wise to adopt the single standard of silver, to adopt the free coinage of silver, themselves voted or their friends, a majority at least, voted for the free coinage of silver and then made it impossible to pass any revenue law.

My honorable friend the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] yesterday talked a good deal about the Dingley bill. It was slaughtered in the house of its friends by his vote as well as by the votes of all others who, while believing in the gold or fixed standard of value and the use of silver as contingent, voted to defeat the bill by the adoption of the free coinage of silver. That is the history of the bill.

Mr. GORMAN. The Senator from Ohio does not mean to say that I voted for that proposition.

Mr. SHERMAN. I can not say who did. I know that a majority of the Senate voted for it, and I think a majority of the Democrats did, but I am not sure. I will take the Senator's word for it, whatever it is.

Mr. GORMAN. There was, and there is, an element on both sides of the Chamber, possibly a majority, irreconcilably opposed to such action. I think a small majority of Democrats voted for the free-coinage amendment to the bill; a very large minority of them voted against it. A very large minority of the Senator's party on the other side of the Chamber voted for the free coinage of silver.

Mr. SHERMAN. A small minority of this side voted for free coinage, and a large majority on the other side did, as I remember. I do not recall the votes of particular Senators, nor do I care. It is not material. It is sufficient to know that the raw head and the bloody bones of silver killed any attempt to add to the revenues of the Government. It is not the fault of the Republican party or of the Democratic party. It is because this new question is thrust into every other matter that is presented to the Senate, and I trust that in the present campaign a bold and manly stand will be taken by both sides, every man acting according to his judgment, and that the question will be settled. If it is settled in favor of silver, then we will have dollars that will have the purchasing power of only half of the present dollar. If we stand by the present standard we will have a standard that is adopted in nearly all the principal civilized nations of the world.

Mr. PEPPER. Dollars twice as valuable.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is not the question I am debating now. I am perfectly willing to abide by the action of the people of the United States and also of future Congresses. That is all I care to say about the Dingley bill.

The honorable Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] said I was inconsistent, in that in a speech I made in January last I said I would vote for any tax, for a tax on tea or coffee or sugar. So I say now. Rather than have this Congress adjourn with a growing deficiency, I would vote for almost any kind of a duty; but I do not propose to allow the other side of the Chamber to designate precisely what those duties shall be. I wish to be consulted about it. We Republicans have nearly a majority here, and while I would vote very cheerfully, as a measure of temporary relief, for a tax on tea and coffee and sugar, a moderate tax to aid in support of the Government under its present circumstances, yet I would not make the whole burden of increased taxation fall upon the people who drink tea and coffee.

The Senator from Maryland asked me if I would be willing to take a tax on tea and coffee as a substitute for all other measures. I said no. But if tea and coffee and sugar and other articles of that kind should contribute their portion of the taxes, so as to distribute their burden among our people fairly, without making it fall upon those articles consumed largely by the poorer classes, then, as a matter of course, I would be willing to vote for a moderate tax on tea and coffee and sugar and many other articles that might be named. But the idea of levying $50,000,000 of taxation on tea and coffee never entered into the mind of anybody except my honorable friend the Senator from Maryland; and I do not believe he would vote for such a proposition.

Mr. GORMAN. Will the Senator from Ohio pardon me for interrupting him?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. GORMAN. I suggested to the Senator yesterday what every intelligent man in this country knows, that with the present divisions in this body it is utterly impossible to pass any revenue measure that trenches upon party lines and party ideas, and hence it was that I asked him if he would accept a proposition to impose a revenue duty of 25 per cent on tea and coffee—

Mr. SHERMAN. You propose to put on revenue duties only.

Mr. GORMAN. A less duty than is imposed on any other article on the list, when the Senator knows, as I know, that the imposition of such a tax would not increase by a farthing the cost of either tea or coffee to the consumers of the United States.

Mr. SHERMAN. The proposition made by the Senator was that we would drop out of all of that bill which he denounced—

Mr. GORMAN. Yes; strike out all after the enacting clause.

Mr. SHERMAN. And put a tax upon tea and coffee.

Mr. GORMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. SHERMAN. That was the proposition. I do not believe the Senator would vote for it. There would be such a complaint made by the women of the land that he could not live here safely if such a tax were proposed. I do not think any sensible man would propose to levy $50,000,000 on tea and coffee, leaving sugar to go free, and allowing all the various articles of importation to come in free of duties except such as are levied by existing law.

Mr. GORMAN. The Senator misunderstands me, and I know he would like to have the fact stated accurately. I did not suggest that we should levy $50,000,000 on tea and coffee.

Mr. GRAY. Or leave sugar go free.

Mr. GORMAN. Or let sugar go free. I let the tariff stand precisely as it is now. That is a party measure for which the Democratic party is responsible. It has not produced revenue enough and there is an emergency. I suggested to the Senator that he take those two items, tea and coffee, and put a revenue duty of about 25 per cent on them, which would bring into the Treasury directly about $30,000,000, a sufficient amount to cover the deficit at least for this year.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is sufficient to say that every Republican would resent such a tax. We are in favor of taxing so that it will necessarily incidentally protect American industries. We think that those taxes ought mainly to be levied upon articles that are imported from Europe and compete with our own industries, so that to the extent of the incidental protection our own industries will be built up and fostered. That is the Republican idea.

Mr. GORMAN. Now, what—

Mr. SHERMAN. The Democratic idea—let me state it—as I understand it, is to be absolutely indifferent as to the effect on our own domestic productions of taxation by tariff upon goods imported into this country. It seeks to put a tax upon such articles as tea and coffee and sugar and the like, which enter into every family and homestead in the land, and to make those articles bear the burdens of this great Government of ours.

Mr. MILLS. Not all of the burdens.

Mr. GORMAN. The Senator from Ohio has stated the difference between the two parties. He knows the impossibility of our coming together on these lines in this body as it is now organized.

Mr. SHERMAN. With a Democratic President in the White House, a Republican House of Representatives, and a plurality of Republicans in the Senate Chamber, is it expected of us that we shall surrender to you everything—

Mr. GORMAN. No; I do not—

Mr. SHERMAN. And adopt your creed and your principles? On the contrary, we expect to overthrow you, if the good time should come. We are doing it in a friendly way. When we offered you the Dingley bill, if the Democratic party had proposed reasonable amendments to the bill, anything that would strengthen the revenue, which was just and fair, they would have been accepted with great pleasure. The Committee on Finance, as I said before, was evenly divided between the two great parties. We had no advantage whatever on the important question. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES] has strong opinions, and he was in favor of the free coinage of silver. Every Democratic member of the committee voted with him, and thus created this very embarrassment. A single Democrat would have saved us. Had the Dingley bill been taken up in order, it could have been amended and changed so as to meet the judgment of the considerate men of the Senate of both political parties. It is far from being a Republican measure. Every Republican would scout it as a Republican measure. It is a measure designed to relieve a Democratic Administration upon the call of their President, and it is nothing else. We would have yielded largely to our Democratic friends upon a temporary tariff which was to last only until the time when we hoped to make a better tariff—that is, some time next year.

There is another thing. My honorable friend, the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], has spoken of the issue of bonds, why they were issued, the amount of money that has been collected and held in the Treasury in consequence of the issue of bonds. I say now to the Senate, with full knowledge that I am absolutely correct, that there is no law on the statute book by which the Government of the United States can issue any bond for the purpose of meeting deficiencies. There is at this moment no law in existence which authorizes the President to sell a bond of the United States to pay deficiencies created by lack of revenue. But the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to sell bonds to provide for the resumption and maintenance of specie payments. The resumption act provides that he may sell bonds of a certain character and description in order to meet and maintain resumption, to pay the notes which are presented.

All the bonds which have been recently sold were sold for that purpose. The Administration has used the money to some extent, or did use it for a while, for the purpose of bolstering up and paying the deficiencies as they occurred. But it was soon found, when notes were presented and gold paid for them, that if the notes were immediately paid out they would again be presented, and thus the endless chain which the President of the United States described would go on. To put a stop to the endless chain they had to hold perforce the notes that were presented for redemption until there was demand for gold. That is necessarily true in cases of banks and all other institutions which issue paper money. When the time comes when notes are presented for payment they must pay them and hold them until they can issue them again at par with the standard money of the country. That operation is necessarily the result of fear created by want of revenue.

More than all else that now creates the disturbance in our country is the deficiency of revenue. If a man is deficient in his revenue at the end of the year he is miserable. If he has a little surplus over he is happy. So it is in the great affairs of a country. Any nation that is compelled to expend more money in time of peace than the revenues of the Government amount to is on the road to ruin, just as any man who spends more money than his income or than he earns is sure to go to the poorhouse in the end. That is the difficulty. The very fact that there has been a deficiency of revenue from the beginning of this Administration caused the doubt and now creates the uncertainty.

The President and the Secretary of the Treasury were perfectly justified in pursuing the course they have followed. They could not have done otherwise. Suppose they had refused payment of United States notes in gold. The result would have been that our money would have at once fallen below par and a disturbance in foreign and domestic trade would have occurred. They did right. Though I hold far different opinions from them on many questions, yet I stand here and say boldly and openly that in managing our financial affairs during the present condition of things I think the Secretary of the Treasury and the President have done their full duty, and I could say no more if there were a Republican President in office.

There are one or two things which were said yesterday by my friend, the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN], to which I wish to call attention. He talked a good deal about economy. He is opposed to large appropriations. He wants the Government to be kept within its means, and yet I am told he has been very liberal to Maryland; that after doing all that is proposed by the House of Representatives for their local interests, he secured an appropriation here in the river and harbor bill for $400,000 for the harbor at Baltimore. He is always careful of his own and the people of his State. He has not, so far as I know, voted against any of the propositions to add to the enormous sums that have been put upon the appropriation bills. I think he is about as liberal in the use of public money as anybody I know of, and yet he arraigns the Republican party for being extravagant.

I shall not confess the sins of my party, but if I had the power I would not appropriate one dollar in excess of what naturally would come into the Treasury under existing laws. If I were an executive officer, as Mr. Cleveland and Mr. Carlisle are, I would not pay out one dollar of any appropriation that was not required to pay salaries and contracts. The ordinary contingent appropriations that run through all our appropriation acts are not mandatory upon the Secretary, and he can withhold the money. I believe and hope he will do it, because from his sagacious management heretofore I believe that he will not place himself in the position of spending money which he has no power to replace by the sale of bonds or by any provision authorized by this Congress.

I might be asked, why not propose bonds? We know such a measure can not be passed in the Senate. If it can be, let the Senator from Maryland try it. Let him provide some means of supplying a deficiency that may be created by the excess of appropriations over receipts. If he is opposed to these high appropriations in the bills, why does he not contest them and point them out, and I will vote with him to strike them out or reduce them. It seems to me the real difficulty that now stares us in the face is not the free coinage of silver, nor the standard of value, but the deficiency in revenue of the Government to meet the requirements of the public service. That is the trouble. The silver question must be settled by the people of the United States. I do not care how soon.

My own opinions on the subject are perfectly known and I need not repeat them. I believe that it is wise for this country, as the richest and most powerful one in the world, to hold to that standard which is recognized by all the chief civilized nations of the world. I am in favor of gold as the standard of value, but I am in favor of the use of silver to the largest amount possible. I will go far, perhaps farther than anyone else here, in a negotiation with foreign nations to establish some ratio between the two metals, so that there will be no deception in money. The gold standard is better for every business man, for every man conducting business affairs, and it is better for every laboring man. Nowhere in the world does the laboring man get as many dollars of as high purchasing power as are paid to him for all kinds of labor in the United States of America. No one will suffer more severely than he by a lowering of the standard of value. Every laboring man can buy more under this system with his money than any other. It seems to me we ought not to disturb the parity of the two coins of silver and gold.

Let this question be decided by the people of the United States. Let the two great parties of the country state honestly their opinions, one way or the other, and then we will be able to settle the matter in the next Congress. Debate here, a controversy or conversation between the Senator from Colorado and myself, will not settle matters. He calls me, what is it?—a gold bug. [Laughter.] Well, sir, I am a gold bug.

Mr. TELLER. I think if the Senator from Ohio will look over my speeches he will find that I have never called him a gold bug.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is somebody else.

Mr. TELLER. I have never used the term.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is the common term applied to those who believe gold is the better standard of value. I can have no interest in a question of that kind. I am neither a miner nor an owner of gold or silver. I believe in that money which measures fairest and best the production and property of the people of the United States. I believe the United States would go a grade down in the family of nations if it undertook to establish as the standard of value a metal one-half in value of what is now considered the standard and upon which all the contracts for forty years have been made by the people of the United States. We honestly differ about that. There is no power to settle that difference except the people of the United States of America. I appeal in this case to them, not upon the arguments I have presented, but upon the broad lines of public policy—of faithfully and honestly performing all contracts and obligations. This is the issue now before the people. Let it be tried if possible without heat or passion and so as to promote the honor and prosperity of the United States.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio repeats what the gold-standard people always state when they make a speech. There is not a speech made that does not have in it the statement that if you go to free coinage you will have a 50-cent dollar. The fact is you have a two-dollar dollar now, and that is what is the trouble with this country. The dollar of this country to-day measures twice what it used to measure; it commands twice the products. There are several countries in the world that have free coinage, notably Mexico and Japan, and neither of them has a 50-cent dollar. It is a notorious fact which no one will deny who is at all acquainted with the conditions (and if anyone doubts my statement he can take the consular reports from Mexico and Japan and find that I make a correct statement) that the purchasing power of the Mexican dollar and the Japanese yen, which is equivalent to a dollar practically, is as great now as it was thirty years ago. That is true of the Mexican dollar, which circulates all over Asia, in the Straits Settlements, in China, and to some extent, though not much, in India; it will buy as much as it ever bought. The India rupee, equivalent at its face value to about 2 shillings of English money, will buy just as much as it would ever buy. There has been no depreciation, or, in other words, there has been no rise of prices when measured by the three kinds of money that I have mentioned in the countries in which they circulate. The Japanese money, which is the standard there, is about the same as the Mexican dollar, and it buys just as much as it used to buy. When the Japanese pays his workmen he pays them just what he used to pay them in silver. When the Mexican pays his workmen he pays them just what he used to pay them in silver. If he wants to buy material for his manufacture, he pays the same price if it is home raised and home produced. The same may be said of India.

Now, why does the Senator from Ohio say there will be a 50-cent dollar? There has been no 50-cent dollar in the countries that have maintained free coinage. The theory of the Senator is that gold has advanced, and if we went to coining silver it would be worth half as much, or worth in its dollar state just as much as in its bullion state.

Mr. President, I do not intend to go into any discussion of that point, except to say that the moment you opened your mint and gave to the silver dollar the same power that you gave to the gold dollar for every purpose whatever in the domestic economy, at least of this country, it would be equivalent to gold. It is equivalent to gold to-day. While silver has not access to the mint, the American silver dollar will buy as much anywhere as the gold dollar. You can not use it, perhaps, as readily for exchange—that is, you can not send it abroad; and yet, if you take with you to Europe an American silver dollar there are a number of countries where it will bring a premium over its face. If you had a million American silver dollars in the city of London you could get credit for a million dollars; you would not get credit for $500,000, because while those dollars could not be converted into English money, or French money, or any other kind of money by melting, they will come back here and be used. So we have had no cheap money in this country, notwithstanding the assertion of the Senator to the contrary.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President—

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. TELLER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SHERMAN. Does the Senator believe that with free coinage the silver dollar would maintain its present purchasing power? I ask the Senator if all the world should have the privilege of entering our mints to coin their silver into dollars how much silver would be brought here?

Mr. TELLER. I do not care to weary the Senate again with repeating the argument. I have spent hours in the Senate to show that the American silver dollar, if we had free coinage, would be just as good as the gold dollar. I do not believe there would be any distinction whatever. All the talk about the English silver or the French silver coming here is nonsense, as I think we have demonstrated a dozen times.

The Senator from Ohio says in addition that we are using a large amount of silver. Mr. President, it does not make any difference about the amount of silver you are using; you are using it in subordination to gold; you make gold the standard. Gold is the measure of prices and not silver. So far as the influence of silver upon commerce and trade is concerned you might just as well have paper money, because it is in subordination. What we try to do is to put the two metals together and make one the equal of the other, so that they shall measure the values in this country and enhance the value of products. If the Senator from Ohio does not think that is valuable and necessary to the prosperity of the country he wants to oppose it, and I suppose that is what he does mean. He wants low prices. We want reasonable prices. He wants prices as they are now. We want prices that will give to the producer some margin for that which he has produced. We want prices that will give to the American farmer more than a fair living, prices that will enable him to pay his debts and to maintain himself in comfort, as he is entitled to be maintained. That is what the fight is for, Mr. President. It is not to secure low prices.

Then the Senator from Ohio appeals to the labor of the country. He means by that the men who work by the day. Who are the laborers? Not the men who take a dollar a day or 50 cents a day, but the men who till the soil—the 20,000,000 farmers and farm hands. They are the men who are interested; they are the men who are producing what they want to get a price for. The men who have their capital in enterprises and see their products selling at a market price below what it cost them to produce are the class of men who are interested.

Mr. President, I do not intend to go into this discussion now, but in the interest of history and truth and exactness I challenge the statement made by the Senator from Ohio that the Sherman bill was passed for the purpose of avoiding free coinage. Without meaning to be offensive to him, I say there is no foundation whatever for that statement. We had been here in the Senate contending for free coinage. We had passed a bill and sent it to the other House, and had been beaten by more than 30 votes. We had in the White House a President who had said to numerous members of this body that if the free-coinage bill came to him he would veto it. We had a Secretary of the Treasury who had declared again and again to Senators and Members that a free-coinage bill would be vetoed by the President. On the day the Sherman bill passed there was no more show of a free-coinage bill becoming a law than there was of the heavens falling.

I will, in the interest of history, state why the Sherman bill passed. If it is a party secret I will give it out, because the statement of the Senator from Ohio has been repeatedly made that he yielded to that measure. The Senator from Ohio believed when he had that bill passed that it would do two things. He believed, first, that it would secure the passage of a tariff bill; and secondly, he believed at that time (he so stated to the Senate at least) that it would help the finances of the country. If he thought about it afterwards and concluded it did not have that effect, he did not think so then. He was a good deal more in favor of the Sherman bill than I was, because I from this seat condemned it as being an illogical bill, and indefensible from a monetary standpoint, agreeing with some of my friends on the other side that it was a makeshift and a mistake.

As I said, there was no probability of a free-coinage bill passing and becoming a law. We had in this body a majority for free coinage, and we who were in favor of a tariff bill were in favor of a free-coinage bill if we could get it, and if we could not get it we wanted something that would come near to it. We did not believe that we could use the tariff bill to secure free coinage. We did not believe the Executive would sign a bill if it had a free-coinage measure attached, although it might be a tariff bill that suited him. We knew then that if we put the free-coinage bill upon the tariff bill the free-coinage bill and the tariff bill both alike would be lost. But we determined that we would put the free-coinage bill upon the tariff bill, which we knew we could do with the help of the Democrats, who, of course, would vote with us. That we said we would do, and that is why the Senator from Ohio yielded his judgment. That is why the Republicans on this side who had been opposed to the free coinage of silver yielded, not to free coinage, but to what they thought was a lesser evil, what they thought would answer the purpose of satisfying the silver Republicans and secure their votes.

Mr. President, that is the unvarnished fact, which more than one Senator on the floor knows as well as I do. We drove our associates in this Chamber who were opposed to free coinage into passing a relief bill, as they call it—a bill in which some of our friends on this side had a great deal more confidence than I had, and they believed it would do more good than I believed it would. It was a bill, I am willing to say, which, illogical as it was, unsound as it was, and indefensible as it was from a proper money standpoint, when the panic came in the fall following the failure of the Baring Bros., which disturbed business in Europe, maintained—and that bill alone maintained—quiet in this country. We had relieved from the Treasury $62,000,000 locked up there. We had put that into circulation at once. We had put into circulation $4,000,000 a month practically, for silver went up to 120 in the beginning, so that in a few months we had put $100,000,000 in circulation, and that tided us over and carried us over the disturbances which occurred in Europe and had its reflex influence upon us here.

Mr. President, that is the unvarnished history of that case. The Senator from Ohio and his compeers who believe with him secured our votes for that purpose; and now what do they tell us? I have heard the Senator say that there never was an hour after he had voted for that bill when he would not have voted to repeal it if he had had a chance. It was a sort of an arbitration or a compromise, and when they obtained the advantage of the compromise they proposed to leave us. I have never forgotten the alacrity, the haste, and the zeal with which the Senator from Ohio and his associates in this Chamber who believe with him came to the rescue of the Democratic Administration when it asked for the repeal of that law, and when they knew its repeal was to strike down the industries of the State that I in part represent on this floor. We got no more sympathy and no more support than if we had been aliens in an alien land.

I remembered then what we had done for them; that we had yielded our judgment and voted for a bill that many of us did not approve of. Upon my judgment I would never have voted for the McKinley bill. I agreed with a number of Senators on this side that the McKinley bill went far beyond what we ought to have done. It was defective in not producing enough revenue, for one thing. The Senator from Ohio says it would have produced enough revenue. It did not produce enough revenue. We barely got through the fiscal year 1893 with $2,000,000 of revenue over and above the expenditures, and then we did not pay out a large amount of appropriations that had been made, and if they had been paid there would have been an actual deficiency that year, as the Senator from Ohio himself and everyone else know. It would not do to say there would have been no deficiency under that bill. There would have been a deficiency under it.

Mr. President, I do not care to prolong this debate. I do not care to go into it further than to make the statement I have made, in the interest of history, in the interest of truth, in regard to the statement so often made here that we could have acquired free coinage in some way but that we were fooled out of it by the astuteness of somebody. If I had not known that free coinage could not have been secured I would never have voted for the Sherman bill, nor the McKinley bill either. I would have voted to attach to the McKinley bill a free-coinage measure, and then if the President had signed it we would have had both. But I knew, as everyone knows (it is nonsense to talk about the case being otherwise), that the President of the United States would not sign a tariff bill, no matter how acceptable, that had attached to it a free-coinage measure. Therefore we were compelled to accept what we believed would be some relief to the country and what turned out to be some relief, a bill that has been much derided and falsified ever since, a bill the repeal of which the Senator from Ohio prophesied would bring prosperity, as it was prophesied on the other side of the Chamber. I recollect very distinctly, and I think I could quote from a distinguished Democrat who sits pretty nearly in the front seat here, some statements he made about the prosperity that was to come if we repealed that law. The newspapers were full of it, and the people were driven into the support of those who were clamoring for its repeal, and finally the law was repealed.

Mr. President, every hour since that time business has grown worse in this country. I did not come here to make a long, detailed speech, but I can produce the evidence right here to show that everything human ingenuity in this country produces—that everything, whether it be the product of the skilled mechanic or the miner or the farmer, save and except gold, has been steadily falling since the repeal of the Sherman law. Farm products have gone down more than 20 per cent below what they were then. Manufactured products have gone down more than 12 per cent below what they were then. There have been more failures in the last year than there were in any other year in our history except the year 1893. There has been more distress among the laboring people of this country during the last year than there has ever been since I have known anything about affairs in this land. The Sherman law did not bring disaster, nor did its repeal bring prosperity.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. President, I wish to submit some observations on one feature of the discussion which has taken place today, but it is too late to begin this evening, it being now 5 o'clock, and I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. GORDON. I hope that we may have an executive session.

Mr. WHITE. Will the Senator from Texas withdraw his motion for the moment?

Mr. MILLS. Certainly.

Mr. WHITE. I desire to submit a minority report from the Committee on Commerce.

[The minority report submitted by Mr. WHITE appears under the heading "Reports of committees."]

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, there is a tradition, possibly a memory, in this body that the naval appropriation bill is before the Senate. I should be very glad, and thereby I think I am voicing the feelings of a large majority of this body on both sides of the Chamber, if occasionally some attention could be paid to that bill and we could, in the regular procession of business, advance its consideration, so that at some not too remote day the bill may be passed and an opportunity given for the other great appropriation bills which must be passed. But I find that at 5 o'clock, not a late hour in the day, but within a month from the time when everyone expects and desires that we shall adjourn, not one moment's time during the day has been consumed by the naval appropriation bill. Everything else has been discussed; and the Senator from Texas, expressing a wish to-morrow morning to prolong the debate upon the currency question, and not being ready to-night to go on, indicates a desire to adjourn.

Mr. GRAY. Let us go on to-night with the appropriation bill.

Mr. HALE. All I have to say, Mr. President, is that, representing the committee, and perhaps the desire of the Senate, as has been indicated, to put through the appropriation bills, I am powerless. If Senators insist and persist in lugging into the consideration of appropriation bills all the old questions and all the dreary prophecies and all the fulminations about the currency question, we never shall get the appropriation bills through, and we shall be hung up here and the session will be prolonged until the heated term commences, until the Presidential conventions have come and gone, and we shall be here until August or September.

Mr. STEWART. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Maine, if he will allow me, in all business, that if he wants to exclude the discussion of the silver question and keep it out, he ought to keep his gold-standard friends quiet. We had been very quiet for many days until to-day. When the author of the misery of the country has taken the floor and occupied the time, do Senators suppose that we will not protest? Something will be said on this subject to-morrow and the next day. If the gold-standard advocates can afford it, we shall talk, too.

Mr. HALE. I am not in any way the sponsor or in any way accountable for the participation in the debate of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. STEWART. It started on your side.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Ohio has taken up very little time. The political discussion was started yesterday by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN]. I do not think that the Senator from Maryland was disappointed in the discussion. He started out with a proposition relative to the appropriations in the naval appropriation bill, which was perfectly legitimate. He had his right under the rules to extend far beyond and to go into other issues. Thereby he provoked the Senator from Ohio and other Senators to brief replies and retorts; but all passed with a small consumption of time. I do not complain that the Senator from Maryland in any way fatigued the Senate; he never does that; he talked to the point; but unfortunately he started the political discussion. It has been followed to-day by the Senator from Colorado, whose opinions upon this subject are well known, and he entertained us with a long speech on his side of the question that had nothing to do with the naval appropriation bill whatever. Of course it brought out the Senator from Ohio in a brief rejoinder. The Senator from Ohio consumed but little time.

What I am complaining of now, if I complain at all, is that the Senate understands the situation, and if it is prepared to indefinitely postpone real business and embark on this vast sea of debate on the currency question, out of which no good can come, no conversions can be made, no procession of business, no advance in anything, then, as I have said, I am at the mercy of the Senate. I should like now, however, as a practical proposal, as a practical matter, to go on until 6 o'clock with the consideration of this almost forgotten measure, the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I hope the Senator's time will be extended. [Laughter.]

Mr. HALE. No; I do not desire any extension. I am talking in favor of business and trying to bring the Senate to a realization of the situation. I should hope that to-morrow the Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS] would curb his remarks in the further discussion of the silver question and allow the Senate to go on with the consideration of the appropriation bills. The Committee on Appropriations will do its duty; it will have another bill here ready for the consideration of the Senate the moment that one appropriation bill is considered and passed; it will not keep the Senate waiting one hour. The bills are ready for presentation here, and the committee will stand ready at all times to carry out what it believes is the desire of the body; but a few Senators can thwart all that.

Mr. MILLS. I will relieve the mind of the Senator from Maine, so that he can sleep soundly to-night, by telling him that I shall not have a word to say on the silver question. I want to speak on an entirely new question.

Mr. HALE. A new question will be the naval appropriation bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. MILLS. I will speak on that.

Mr. HALE. I should be very glad to hear any comments, and I know they will be in point, from the Senator from Texas on that subject.

Now, I ask that the President of the Senate will see that the pending amendment is stated. The Senator from California [Mr. WHITE] has indicated that he desires to speak upon the pending bill, and I know that he is in readiness, and has been all day.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understood the Senator from Texas to move to adjourn.

Mr. MILLS. I will withdraw the motion to allow the Senator from California to move to go into executive session.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, when I took the floor it was yielded to me by the Senator from Texas, and I now yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. MILLS. Then I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. HALE. At this hour, no later than 5 o'clock, and no business having been done, I certainly shall call for the yeas and nays upon that proposition.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair submits to the Senate the motion of the Senator from Texas.

Mr. MILLS. I know the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] wishes to submit some remarks, and I yield to him.

Mr. STEWART. I wish to make a few remarks. I intend to speak before this question passes away.

Mr. HALE. Let the Senator from Nevada go on to-night.

Mr. MILLS. I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I desire to reply to the question of the Senator from Ohio. He asks, how much silver would come to this country in case of free coinage? I answer, none whatever by reason of free coinage. Silver with or without free coinage would be brought to this country for the purpose of sale or exchange for our commodities, and not otherwise. If silver would flood us in case of free coinage, why does it not flood Japan? Her mints are open. Why does it not flood Mexico and various countries of South America? Their mints are open. Why did it not flood India while her mints were open? The simple reason is that the price of silver and all other articles internationally dealt in are the same all over the world. There is no object in taking it to any country except in the course of trade; and no more silver is ever imported in any country than is required for use in that country.

France, for seventy years prior to 1873, maintained the equilibrium of exchange all over the world by keeping her mints open for the coinage of both gold and silver at the ratio of 15½ to 1. Nobody will sell silver in any part of the world for a less price than they could obtain in France, nor would they sell gold for a less price than the coin value in France. They did not for this reason take their gold or their silver to France unless they desired to buy the products of France? The fact that they could get a fixed price for either metal in France maintained the price of both metals throughout the world. It has been suggested that Japan, for example, would bring her silver here and pay duties on her products with the silver she would import, and thereby cheat the United States out of their revenue. This is a most absurd statement. Why should they bring silver here when it will bring the same in Japan? Besides, Japan is not a silver-producing country. The United States produces a very large amount of silver, and silver would be exported rather than imported in case of free coinage, the same as now.

The Senator from Ohio has often asserted that the idols of India would be brought here and coined into our dollars. What nonsense. Who would pay the expense of bringing the idols of India into this country, coining them into dollars, and re-forming them into idols? This imaginary trouble of a flood of silver is shown to be absurd from the fact that no silver-standard country has suffered any inconvenience on that account. If the people of any country desire our products and will bring their silver here and exchange it at the market price for what we have to sell, we will be benefited thereby and will have no cause to complain.

There is another point constantly made by the Senator from Ohio. He says that the opening of our mints to free coinage would produce a 50-cent dollar. He says at the same time that the silver miner would be greatly benefited by receiving a 50-cent dollar for 41½ grains of standard silver. Does not the Senator from Ohio know that the silver miner can receive to-day a little over 50 cents in gold for a sufficient amount of silver to be coined into a silver dollar? If he would receive only a 50-cent dollar by free coinage, how would he be benefited? He can receive that now. Either there would be no silver 50-cent dollar or the silver miner would receive no benefit, for he can only be benefited to the extent that the value of silver is appreciated by free coinage. He would not receive any benefit from the depreciation in value of gold by the increase of the volume of standard money. But the debtor, the producer, and the people at large would be benefited to the full extent of doubling the value of their labor, their products, and everything they had to sell. They would also be benefited fully a hundred per cent in being relieved from the burden of debts, taxes, and other fixed charges, because they could pay fixed charges with the same amount of money as they could have done before silver was demonetized, which would be one-half the amount of wheat, cotton, or other property which would be required now to pay a fixed amount of money.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him at that point?

Mr. STEWART. In a minute.

So the miner would not be benefited at all, except to the extent that it enhanced the value of silver.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Has the Senator from Nevada what might be considered definite information as to the amount of uncoined silver bullion there is in the world outside of the United States?

Mr. STEWART. I have labored hard to keep the run of this matter, and I will say to the Senator there are probably from eight to ten million dollars of uncoined silver bullion in the world.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Will the Senator state where it is?

Mr. STEWART. It is mostly in China. There is no accumulation, but in going from the mines to the place of consumption there would be probably from eight to ten million dollars.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I will state to the Senator that on the 1st of January there were only two and a half million ounces of silver bullion in London, and less than a half million ounces of silver bullion in New York.

Mr. STEWART. That is true. But there would be some in transit; and I allow for that. I do not suppose there is any place where there is $2,000,000 in the aggregate of silver bullion. The silver is used for coinage or in the arts as fast as it is produced, the same as gold is, and there is no accumulation of that.

But the most exasperating stock argument of the Senator from Ohio is that the silver miner would be the only person benefited by free coinage. He says that in case of free coinage the silver dollar would be worth only 50 cents. The silver miner can get more than 50 cents now for 412½ grains of standard silver, the amount required to make a silver dollar. Either the silver dollar would be worth more than 50 cents or the miner would receive no benefit whatever from free coinage. The real benefit which the miner would receive would be exactly the amount which silver would be advanced in price by reason of free coinage. He would get no benefit from the depreciation of gold in consequence of the addition which free coinage would make to standard money. The author of hard times, who has so long represented the State of Ohio in these Halls, speaks of the benefits of the gold standard. Every assertion he makes with regard to those benefits is refuted by the universal distress which his policy has inflicted upon the country.

The original act in 1873 was passed through strategy and fraud. The clause which demonetized silver was not read in the Senate during the discussion of the bill. It is a remarkable fact that no mention was made during the pendency of the mint act which demonetized silver that the silver dollar was omitted from the list of coinage. The Senator from Ohio had charge of the bill and never alluded to the fact that he was demonetizing silver or adopting the gold standard. If he had done so, his object would have been defeated. From that time till now he has contended for the gold standard and contraction, and the country is now suffering from his policy.

I should not have engaged in any discussion on the silver question at this session of Congress if the gold men had not taken the lead; but when the author of hard times and the agents of the conspirators who are robbing the country of a circulating medium see fit to open the discussion for political purposes, the silver men can not be silent. When the author of hard times pretends that his policy is in the interest of labor, it is difficult to be silent. He speaks of the 200-cent dollar which the Rothschilds combination has secured as beneficial to the laborer. It would be very good for the laborer if he could obtain it; but in view of the fact of the millions of tramps and of the many millions that are out of employment, it is difficult to see how the laborers are to be benefited by the Rothschilds dollar.

How are the taxpayers and the interest payers benefited by being required to surrender twice as much property or twice as much labor to pay a debt as would have been required to earn that amount of money at the time it was contracted? Thirty thousand millions of debts resting upon the people of the United States is no small matter. The interest on that vast sum is a fixed obligation. Five hundred millions to maintain the Government, fifteen hundred millions for State and local taxation are also fixed obligations, and it requires to-day twice as much of wheat, cotton, or other products to pay these fixed charges as it would if the 100-cent dollar were restored. The 200-cent dollar of the Rothschild-Sherman stamp has destroyed the prosperity of the country and closed every avenue to wealth and progress.

I desire to give notice to the gold-standard advocates that in case any one of them attempts to justify the criminal method by which silver was demonetized, or to argue that the gold standard is beneficial to the community, I will answer his arguments at length. All that is required to induce me to make a full and complete speech on the silver question, though it may take weeks, is an inauguration of debate by some gold-standard man in the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7542) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, a person who had been observing the proceedings of the Senate this afternoon would, I think, fail to recognize the fact that the naval appropriation bill is pending before the Senate and that the question is upon a motion made by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] to amend the bill by decreasing the number of battle ships recommended by the bill as it came from the House from four to two. I do not think that that amendment ought to prevail. I think that we may well appropriate for the four battle ships.

There are two matters which I think fully receive the approval of the country; one is the building up of a sufficient navy. I do not say a navy which shall equal in the number of ships and the weight of fighting equipment the great navy of Great Britain, or perhaps of France, or of other nations which have a great navy, but a sufficient navy.

The other thing the people desire and to which they have given their approval is the fortification of our cities and our coast, so that our nation shall be put in a state where it can defend itself against the attack of any foreign navy. I think Senators who suppose that the people will not justify the expenditure of large sums of money for both these objects are mistaken. I think that whatever may be the condition of our Treasury and our finances, it is the part of wisdom both to increase our Navy so that it shall be sufficient and to fortify our coasts so that they may be defended against any foreign attack. Defensive measures, protective measures, always cost money; and I do not use the word "protective" in the sense in which it has been used here this afternoon. But any nation, or any community, indeed, finds it necessary to adopt certain protective measures. The nation must have an army, the State must have a constabulary, the city must have a police force. Those are all necessary for the defense and protection of the property, of the life, and of the liberty of the citizen.

A nation should therefore adopt all necessary measures of defense. I do not think that the building up of a sufficient navy and the adoption of a comprehensive plan for coast defenses should depend upon the question whether our revenues are equal to our expenditures. They are necessities in this country, and the country is rich. The parallel does not hold between a government which, in a single year, does not have as much revenue as its expenditures amount to and an individual who, at the end of his year's business, finds that his expenditures have exceeded his receipts. The country is rich. It is not engaged in business as an individual is. It levies its contribution by way of taxes upon its people for what are supposed to be the necessary expenditures, and if it so happens that at this particular time there is a deficiency in our yearly receipts, as compared with our expenditures, it is no reason why we should neglect to put ourselves in a proper state of defense. I think we ought to adopt the provision for the four battle ships which is in the bill as it comes from the other House, and that at the present session of Congress we ought also to inaugurate a complete system for our coast defenses and to appropriate as much money this year as can profitably and properly be expended for the purpose of carrying the system into full effect. Of course we can not expend this year all the money which is required for coast defenses, but whatever may be properly expended ought to be appropriated.

Nor, Mr. President, do I think the argument that our expenditures exceed our receipts holds good upon another point. We have a large surplus in the Treasury, and it does not matter, for the purpose of expenditure, how it came there. We have over and above the gold reserve somewhere in the neighborhood of a hundred and sixty or a hundred and seventy million dollars. I do not know the precise figures; but the money is there, no matter how it came there. It was unfortunate, perhaps, that we had to issue bonds; but we did issue bonds, and those bonds brought money into the Treasury. Now, for the building up of a sufficient Navy, for the adoption of a comprehensive system of coast defenses, why should we not use that money? Why should we insist upon keeping in the Treasury the one hundred and sixty or one hundred and seventy-five million dollars over and above the gold reserve because, forsooth, our annual receipts do not exceed our annual expenditures? What are we going to do with the money in the Treasury? Are we going to keep it there always? Are we going to keep it there until the bonds mature? There is no deficiency likely to occur which can by any means use up that surplus.

Now, for a system of coast defenses, I think it would have been entirely proper to issue the bonds of this country, if we needed to do so, for the purpose of providing the money to establish and carry on the system of fortifications and defenses of our country. The bonds were issued for another purpose, but the proceeds being in the Treasury, it is quite proper, as it seems to me, to appropriate the money. Therefore I do not agree with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN], who thinks we ought to have but two battle ships this year. I think there is nothing more essential, whatever the condition of our finances may be, so far as receipts and expenditures are concerned, than that we should provide for our defense.

Mr. President, the events of the last six months, while perhaps not so alarming as some people have thought, have impressed upon the thoughtful minds the fact that we are not beyond the possibility of attack from foreign nations. We know also that we are lamentably deficient in any preparation to meet such an attack, and I insist that not only sentiments of patriotism but a proper regard for our own commercial interests require that we should put our country in a state of proper defense both by the Navy and by coast defenses.

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR], who has been called away from the Senate, desired to express his sentiments in favor of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN], not because he did not believe that we should expend the money that is necessary for the four battle ships, but because he feared that if we did expend it for four battle ships we should not make a proper appropriation and expenditure for our coast defenses. I think we may do both. He felt that we should not do much for our coast defenses if we built four battle ships, and he has prepared a presentation of his views which very fully set forth the fear that if we appropriate for the four battle ships it will be taken off and away from the appropriations for coast defenses. His views are so intelligently presented in his preparation of them that I shall take the liberty of quoting from them at length.

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR] says:

"Mr. President, I wish it distinctly understood that anything I may say on this bill is in no spirit of hostility to the Navy. I wish to see it increase and prosper. It is an honor to the country and deserves encouragement at our hands, and any comparisons I may make are not in a spirit of detraction, for I am an earnest believer in the usefulness and importance of a sufficient navy. But I claim that the coast defenses are far behind in their proper relation to the Navy, and that as we are limited by the lack of revenue in the amount we may properly appropriate our first and greater duty is toward coast defense. This is taking care of what we have and a measure for safety and insurance from loss. It may not be wise for a man to borrow money to build a house, but it is certainly wise for him, no matter what his financial condition may be, to keep properly insured the house he has already built. We can well afford to borrow money to make our country safe by means of defense. How far we can afford to borrow to make it strong for offensive operations is quite another question. Ours, Mr. President, is the only country in the world which can make any pretension of strength that has not a good system of harbor defense, and ours is the country of all others which has most need of it. Our great sea line and the great number of our harbors makes it impossible to defend our country in any other way than by fortifying our harbors unless we build a navy strong enough to cross the seas and sweep the most powerful European navy off the face of the ocean.

"On the other hand, Mr. President, ours is the country of all others among the great powers that has the least need of a great navy. We have no colonies and desire none, and in case of war with a great power, we would never send a navy to attack them.

"This naval appropriation bill provides for more newships than have been before provided for at any one time in the recent history of our Government, and it is but just that this provision should be considered in connection with the subject of harbor defense appropriations. Shall we make so large an appropriation for the increase of the Navy that nothing but the annual excuse can be given for coast defense, for our recent appropriations have been but excuses? I am in favor of a steady and reasonable increase of the Navy with the growth of the country, and I believe that this policy can be continued and still have the proper attention given to harbor defenses. But I insist that if the conditions of the revenue are such that we can have but one, the preference should be given to harbor defenses. This is our first duty to the whole country and to the Navy itself. I do not believe that this position can be controverted by sound argument.

"There has recently been much newspaper comment on the subject. The following is from the Scientific American, March, 1896:

THE PROPOSED INCREASE IN OUR NAVY.

It is announced from Washington that the House Naval Committee has recommended that an appropriation of over $30,000,000 be made for the addition to our Navy of 4 battle ships and 15 torpedo boats. This would double the amount of any previous naval appropriation.

The Scientific American has for many years realized that our national defenses, both on sea and land, were not keeping pace with our commercial growth. We have been favorable to such a reconstruction of both forts and Navy as should enable our country to present an impregnable line of defense against the attack of any enemy or possible combination of enemies.

We have always felt, moreover, that such efforts of reconstruction should be directed toward this one single object of defense, and that the sums of money appropriated for this purpose should be distributed between land and sea defenses in such proportion as to secure the most effective results.

In view of the fact that we are a republican and not an imperial people, whose interests are domestic and not colonial, we have always felt that the sphere of our naval and military operations lay, or should lie, within our own shore lines, and that, therefore, our coast fortifications should be regarded as being practically our first line of defense, and that our Navy should be considered as complementary to our land defenses and should be designed strictly with a view to cooperation with the forts in our various roadsteads and harbors.

We have noticed with regret and some measure of apprehension that, while naval appropriations have been forthcoming at a rate that has created a complete modern navy in a few years' time, the land fortifications, which, as we have seen, should be considered as our first line of defense, have been practically neglected. So antiquated are the old fortifications and so incomplete the new that for purposes of cooperation with the Navy they are of very limited value.

Now, in view of the foregoing considerations, we think the time has come for the Government to bend its whole energies to bringing our land fortifications up to their proper strength relative to the new Navy.

While fully appreciating all that has been done in the past, we can not help thinking that the Government has attacked the problem of national defense at the wrong end. If only a part of the money which has been expended upon the Navy had been devoted to constructing a system of land defenses this country would to-day have been impregnable against attack from the sea and would have possessed the nucleus of a very respectable navy besides.

The Endicott Board of 1885 devised a complete system of land defenses, which included every maritime city of importance. The total estimate for this scheme was about $100,000,000. We have spent upon the new Navy about $120,000,000 up to date. If the above scheme had been carried out there would now have been mounted at our various seaports no less than 1,570 guns of 8-inch caliber and upward, as against the present 136 guns in the Navy, and 300 rapid-fire guns against the Navy's 187.

Such a comparison as this calls for no comment further than to say that a gun mounted within the shelter of a fort is worth at least two mounted on the unstable and exposed platform of a ship's deck.

The arguments in favor of concentrating our energies upon our land defenses rather than upon our Navy are both practical and ethical—these latter being based upon the spirit of our Constitution and upon those broad principles which dominate our national life and give us our strong national individuality.

The practical arguments may be classified as follows:

First. That a proper system of land defenses will make our great cities safe from any naval attack.

Second. Such a system can be constructed for a sum many times less than the cost of a navy like the great navies of Europe, and for a sum that may reasonably be expended.

Third. Land fortifications are much more efficient for coast defense than a navy, and when once constructed are durable, cheaply maintained, and easily strengthened.

Fourth. The defense of our cities can not be left to the Navy alone, however large.

Fifth. A navy that would equal the great navies of Europe is unnecessary, and its cost makes such a navy impracticable.

Sixth. A navy quickly deteriorates and is expensive to maintain.

Seventh. The construction of land defenses should always precede the building of a navy.

The ethical argument can be briefly stated by saying that when we have adequately provided for home defense our duty in the matter of military and naval preparation is done. Our Navy should be of such proportions only as are necessary for successful cooperation with the land defenses. Our naval programme should be laid down with strict regard to a home as distinct from a foreign—a republican as distinct from an imperial policy.

Great Britain's navy, by way of example, has been called into existence by the exigencies of the defense of an Empire whose widely scattered colonies bring her into hourly danger of conflict with any one of a dozen different governments. The secret of the strength of our great Republic lies not merely in the political and geographical union of its many States beneath one flag and within a single boundary line, but also in the fact that it has been both able and willing to concern itself with its own internal development, and has in the past and we hope it will in the future carefully abstain from embarrassing entanglements with the affairs of other peoples and nations.

The building up of a navy of European proportions would be a distinct departure from the national traditions above mentioned, and would involve the entering upon a policy whose execution would be as exhausting to the National Treasury as its principles would be opposed to the spirit of our Constitution and subversive of the brightest hopes of its founders.

[From the Chicago Tribune of February 29, 1896.]

In the last thirteen years $110,317,710 have been spent for the increase of the Navy, and during the same time only $10,631,710 for coast defense, and yet with this apparently large expenditure our naval equipment is hopelessly behind all foreign powers, and especially behind Great Britain. Figures again explain our naval inefficiency and the hopelessness of trying to overtake Great Britain. While we have spent more than $110,000,000 in the last thirteen years, the English admiralty proposes to still further increase its already colossal naval establishment by spending more than half the above sum upon it in the next six months.

We have been working all this time from the wrong end. Our immunity from attack is not to be secured by piecemeal additions to our Navy, but by strengthening our land fortifications. The sum spent upon the Navy, which still leaves it far behind those of foreign powers, if it had been spent in strengthening the defenses of our coasts, would have rendered them invulnerable against any assault from a foreign fleet. If our harbors were properly fortified, no foreign squadron would make the attempt to capture them, and our seacoast cities would be secure.

How much longer will this Congress remain inactive? How much more testimony does it want from our highest authorities before it will give its consent to take measures for the national defense? How much longer does it propose to leave every seacoast city from Portland, Me., to Portland, Oreg., in an absolutely defenseless condition in case of war with a foreign power? This is a question not of party but of patriotism, and Congressmen should not forget it. If they neglect to provide for ample defense they will be guilty of treacherous and criminal negligence, which should cost every one of them all future political office.

COAST DEFENSE.

[From the New York Tribune of February 23, 1896.]

The report on coast defenses submitted to the Senate by Mr. SQUIRE on Tuesday ought to produce practical results. No public man, so far as we know, pretends to think that this is an unimportant subject or denies the general proposition that an extensive work of fortification ought to be steadily carried to completion. But it would be quite in line with Congressional practice to defer the task or dawdle over it until a more convenient season. Such is the history of operations during the last ten years, since the plan devised by the Endicott board was adopted, and such may be the story of national neglect for years to come, unless advantage is taken of the patriotic sentiment which has lately been aroused and has not yet lost its force.

The report made by Senator SQUIRE substantially confirms the views and calculations of the Endicott board, which planned an expenditure of $98,000,000 during a period of years now about to end, of which in reality less than one-tenth has been expended. It is conceded that a sum considerably in excess of $100,000,000 is essential to an entirely adequate defense of the chief ports of the United States, but it is estimated that fairly satisfactory results could be obtained by an expenditure of $30,000,000, and the bill now under discussion proposes the appropriation of that amount, $10,000,000 being available for use during the rest of this and the next fiscal year, and $10,000,000 annually for seven years thereafter. The enactment of the bill in that form would provide a reasonable guaranty of systematic and steady progress toward a condition of national security. Experience has shown that reliance upon successive appropriations to carry on an imperative work is foolish. The money is never forthcoming when it is needed.

Not a few persons who are keenly sensible of the danger to which stupendous interests are exposed along our defenseless coasts have heretofore imagined that the new Navy would in the near future be able to provide the necessary protection; but that error has been abandoned. Land defenses are indispensable for the security of property on shore; and, more than that, the Navy itself is in a large measure dependent upon them for its safety as well as its efficiency. Every consideration of interest and honor demands the prompt adoption of a comprehensive scheme for the rapid and uninterrupted execution of a task which has been far too long neglected.

"Mr. President, were our Navy to be doubled, at a cost of more than another $100,000,000, instead of increased by four battle ships, it would still be less than one-third as strong as that of the British, provided the latter remained in statu quo; but the policy of England is to keep her navy equal to the combined navies of any two other powers. It is plain to be seen that our Navy, with the proposed additions, will still surely be 'captured or destroyed' in case of a conflict with England. This proposed appropriation for naval increase seems a large one, but in comparison with what will be necessary to render our harbors safe by means of a navy, if, indeed, that were possible, it is but a drop in the bucket. And in the meantime our harbors are without protection. By means of harbor defenses and for a sum many times less than what would be required to place us on naval equality with the great naval powers of Europe we can render our harbors impregnable. It seems unnecessary to recapitulate the many conclusive arguments in favor of harbor defense and its efficiency. It can be accomplished more cheaply and more securely than by a navy. It is a matter of history that no well-constructed land fortification was ever reduced and taken by ships unaided by land forces. It is conceded by army and navy experts that guns mounted on shore are from three to five times more effective than those mounted on ships. When once constructed, fortifications are maintained at a nominal cost, while the maintenance of our present Navy is a constant drain upon the Treasury, to say nothing of the additional expense that will be incurred if the Navy is increased.

"To show the cost of maintaining ships I give the following table of the expense of a three-years commission of the cruisers named:

Baltimore.....	$391,365.05	Philadelphia.....	$309,243.85
Newark.....	808,427.12	San Francisco.....	918,113.91
Charleston.....	702,118.78

"If the expense of maintaining the proposed battle ships increase in proportion to their larger tonnage, the cost of keeping them in commission for three years would be more than two millions each; but as this may not be a fair basis of comparison, I will call it a million and a half, or one-half million per year each.

"Whatever I have said or may say of the expense of building a navy, or of maintaining it when once constructed, I do not say because I oppose these outlays in their proper order and season, but rather because I think it all-important that a navy which is so expensive should be made as effective as it possibly can be and rendered safe from capture and destruction, for it is surely not only for the safety of our harbors that land defenses are necessary, but for the safety of the Navy itself. The first step of every commander of an army or a navy in active service is to select some safe base of operations, a base for organization and equipment from which to draw supplies and to which to send such of his forces as may be disabled. Without one safe harbor on either coast as a base of operations, we are going on to build up a navy which, in case of war with such a power as England, will inevitably be 'captured or destroyed,' as stated by Admiral Walker. The only true way to make the Navy effective is to first fortify our harbors, so it may have a safe basis of operation and for refitting and repairs. In this way we will make our whole Navy available for offensive operations and to aid the land defenses, if needed, and for the protection of smaller ports. Our Navy in this way would be more increased in practical power and efficiency than if the entire amount required to fortify our harbors were expended directly to increase the Navy. It is offering a premium for defeat and disaster in case of a war with a great naval power to further increase our Navy before we fortify harbors that can safely protect it.

"Is it not our duty to defend our own coasts and possessions before we provide the means of attack on other nations? In round numbers, the cost of one battle ship and its armament would more than fortify Portland and the other principal ports of the State that the Senator reporting this bill so ably represents. Great Britain has the great fortified harbor of Halifax, a rendezvous for her fleets at our northern door, while the whole coast of Maine is defenseless. Which would be most for the safety and benefit of the people of that State, a complete system of defense for her harbors or one battle ship more or less? So the cost of a single ship would effectually protect Baltimore and Washington and leave a surplus of two and a half million dollars. Which is the more important, that the great commercial city of Maryland and the capital of the country, which has been burned once, should be defended or that we should have an extra battle ship? The cost of one ship would much more than fortify the Delaware River and protect the great cities of Philadelphia and Wilmington and the shipyards where our vessels are built, which now are at the mercy of any leading power that might be at war with us. The cost of a single ship would fortify Hampton Roads and defend our great navy-yards at Norfolk and the shipyards at Newport News. The cost of two would defend the ports of Boston and Portsmouth, N. H., and leave a surplus of more than a million dollars. The cost of four—the number carried by this bill—would completely protect the whole Pacific Coast—San Francisco, Portland, San Diego, and the great waterway, Puget Sound. The cost of one would defend Puget Sound. Great Britain is to-day making the harbor of Esquimaux impregnable, while we leave our side of Puget Sound defenseless. What can be her principal purpose in this except to provide a base of operations against our Pacific Coast in case of war? What object can it be to her to fortify this harbor, 7,000 miles from her shores, compared with the importance to us of defending our great Pacific Coast? Japan is fast developing into a powerful nation, and one that has an excellent and ever-increasing navy. The development of what I may call this new nation has been so rapid that I will read some extracts taken from an editorial in a recent issue of the New York Tribune:

"A new Japanese battle ship just launched is 412 feet long and 73 feet broad, with a displacement of 12,300 tons. She will carry four 12-inch guns, each with 12° arc of fire; ten 6-inch quick-firing guns, twenty-four 3-pounders, and four torpedo tubes. The armor is 18 inches thick, Harveyized. The horsepower and speed will be 19,000 and 18½ knots with natural draft, and 13,500 and 18½ knots with forced draft, and there will be room in the bunkers for 1,200 tons of coal."

"We have mentioned the new navy of a hundred and twenty ships which she is building. But still more noteworthy is the extension of her mercantile marine. The Japan Mail Steamship Company is extending its regular service to the ports of America, Australia, and Europe, and its 40 or more ocean-going steamers form one of the largest and best fleets in the world. There are several other shipping firms with fine fleets, and the 65 shipyards of the Empire are increasing the tonnage under the Japanese flag at an astounding rate. Whereas in 1888 Japan had only 524 steamers, most of them very small, and at the end of 1893 only 690, at the end of 1894 she had 1,097, and that number has now been increased probably by at least a hundred more, the majority of them large steel and iron ships of several thousand tons burden each."

"The presence of this fleet on the western ocean, which we can not hope to match there for many years to come, and the fortifications being built at Esquimaux but add more to the many reasons why the Pacific Coast should be protected.

"The cost of one battle ship would nearly fortify the five harbors of Wilmington, N. C., Cumberland Sound, Georgia, Pensacola, Galveston, and Charleston, S. C., while one and a half would more than provide for the three harbors of Savannah, Mobile, and Key West. The cost of four—the number carried by this bill, would make the main harbor of New York impregnable and nearly provide for the fortification of the eastern entrance to Long Island Sound, and render the harbors of Connecticut safe from attack. Which is of the greatest importance to the country at large, that we should make safe the great port of New York, from which the bulk of our exports are shipped and where our imports are received and more than 65 per cent of our customs revenues collected, or that we should have four more battle-ships which will make nothing absolutely safe? The cost of one would much more than defend Narragansett Bay and protect our naval establishment at Newport. One-half the cost of one would nearly defend the lake ports. The cost of fourteen would carry out the whole programme of coast defense and "make our harbors impregnable, and yet with fourteen more battle ships we would not have one-third the number England would have. An annual appropriation for four years equal to the cost of three battle ships would nearly complete the entire system of land fortification. Secretary Lamont says, in his recent report to the Senate, that over $25,000,000 could be used advantageously prior to July 1, 1897. But the bill of the Committee on Coast Defenses only calls during the year ensuing for ten millions, which is less than the cost of two battleships, with authority to contract for a like amount annually for the seven following years.

"I will read from some editorials that have recently appeared. First from the Brooklyn Eagle of February 28, 1896.

MORE FORTS.

It sounds worse than it is when this sum is put at over $80,000,000, because this amount is not to be expended in a lump. The building of forts and turrets and batteries is not to be a thing of a day, but will proceed safely, if not leisurely, at an annual cost of perhaps an eighth of the gross sum. The peace feeling, the habit of minding our own business and allowing other nations to mind each others', has tended to a false sense of security; and it was not until the event of possible war was suddenly forced upon us that we realized how weak in many ways we were. The strength of a nation is in its men; but it is folly beyond expression to turn men into targets for the armament of European powers, and there are occasions when it is impossible to avoid war, not merely with honor but to avoid it at all.

We have a possible Navy. Indeed, in the strength of our cruisers we are probably ahead of all other nations. But ships are not enough. With our immense length of coast, parts of it with harbors, other parts of it forming a continuous beach where a military force could be landed from a fleet, it would require a navy ten times as large as ours to be completely effective. Every ship spared from aggressive activity would weaken the sea force by just so much, and many such ships would have to be spared in order to defend the cities. We may be as strong in our defenses as some of the optimists would have us believe; we may have mines and torpedo plants and concealed batteries and electrical appliances that the Army authorities have wisely kept secret from us, or we may not; but however we stand in equipment it is sure that we can not guard our cities too well. It is estimated that the property capable of destruction by a powerful fleet in the outer bay of New York is worth $1,000,000,000. Surely 1 or 2 per cent of this sum is not too much to spend in its defense.

There can be no doubt as to the ultimate efficiency of our Navy, when our coast-defense monitors are finished and the battle ships are in commission—and built. But the way of an enemy that could steal past a protective line of ships would be calculations to too many of our harbors. There are many fortifications, more relics and curiosities of military engineering, that would be worse than useless in case of a siege. The old batteries in the Narrows and on Governor's Island would be more dangerous than open ground at such a time, for the masonry would be splintered over the heads of the garrisons under the pounding of the heavy guns of an English fleet. The increase of range in modern artillery, too, enables a virtual economy to be observed in the new scheme of defense. For instance, Long Island Sound is bordered by towns of size and is a highway to New York and Brooklyn. A fleet sailing westward through the Sound would demolish places like Port Jefferson, College Point, Stamford, and Saybrook, if its admirals thought it worth while to waste ammunition on them, and the conquest of New London, New Haven, and Bridgeport would be almost as easy a matter. In older times each of these ports would have required its armament. But with long-range guns, strong forts erected at the east end of Long Island and the opposite side of the Sound, with a mortar battery on Fisher's Island or Block Island, or both, the Sound and all the villages, towns, and cities fronting on it would be protected. And similar conditions apply in the case of the ports on Puget Sound, the bays of Delaware and Chesapeake, and the lower Columbia.

It is penny wisdom and poor folly to leave all of our greater cities at the mercy of invasion. When war comes it comes quickly, and there is no nation so polite as to give us a few years to prepare ourselves in case war arose with us. It would strike quick and hard. With proper defenses its stroke would fall powerless. The spending of money for ships has been generally approved; but * * * it is an expenditure for which we get a comparatively small return. A war ship is a thing of relatively short life. Types of vessels change, too, so that the battle ship of one decade is obsolete in the next. Repairs are frequent and expensive, and the risks in sailing, even in years of peace, are large. With forts it is different. A solidly constructed work ought to endure for centuries, and it is always easy to repair and keep in order, or even to adapt to changes in guns and mortars that may be brought to bear on it. Again, a good deal of "jerry work" has been done on our ships. But the construction of our forts is different, because the medium which is wrought is different. There are few bolts or plates or such matters to be adjusted, and human muscle enters to a larger extent in the work of construction. In fifty years perhaps not one of our cruisers will be afloat, at least in our service; but the forts at our water passes will be as stout as ever, and will be a virtually permanent bar to the passage of a foreign fleet, which means the destruction of life and property, the pillage of our cities, the restraint of our liberties, and the loss of honor.

"The Post-Dispatch, St. Louis, Mo., of February 28, 1896, said:

THE RATIONAL DEFENSE POLICY.

If the $110,000,000 we have expended within three years on experimental floating batteries, which may be sunk or penned up in some harbor in the event of war, had been devoted to land fortifications and batteries, our principal harbors would now be effectively protected.

But not only are harbor fortifications effective for defense, there is a strong argument in their favor in the traditional policy of the United States. We want the means of defense, not aggression. A powerful Navy is a temptation to aggression and a constant menace to the peace of the country.

The policy * * * is the rational policy for Congress to pursue. It is cheaper, safer, and more effective than navy building.

"The Commercial, of Louisville, Ky., of February 20, 1896, said:

To create such a navy as that of Great Britain would demand an immense sum, and its maintenance would be an unbearable tax. Such a navy is clearly unnecessary. Our position is entirely different from that of Great Britain. Her insular position, her distant and depending colonies, and her widely extended commerce demand the protection of a powerful navy. We have no dependent colonies; our Navy is already strong enough to protect our commerce, which is principally coastwise. What we need is to have all the cities and harbors of our extensive coasts upon the Atlantic and Pacific seaboard made safe from ocean attack by invulnerable defenses. This can be done at an expense much less, and in a manner more effective by land defenses than by a powerful navy. Besides, when completed, the cost of maintenance is trivial in comparison to the immense sums required to keep ships of war repaired, renewed, and afloat. Let us screw down our navy patriotism for a while, and let out the valve which will unloose another quality, quite as creditable and much more practical.

"The Examiner of San Francisco, Cal., of February 28, 1896, said:

If we had spent as much in the past ten years on our fortifications as we have on our Navy our ports would now have been impregnable. A battle ship is a floating gun platform, but it takes a four-million-dollar ship to carry $400,000 worth of guns. On land a gun can be mounted for little more than its own cost, and when it is in place it is equal to from two to six afloat. Two battle ships could be sunk by three vessels of their own kind, but the cost of two battle ships spent on land defenses would protect a port against a whole fleet. Moreover, every ship costs enough every year for maintenance to build a first-class battery on shore, while the fortifications call for almost nothing after their first cost.

We need a moderately strong navy, and can afford to pay for it, but it is not our policy to invest in a navy strong enough to defend us against that of England or France. For that work we must depend upon fortifications.

"The method of reference of the fortifications bill does not seem to me to give it an equal chance with the naval bill. In the House there is no committee on coast defense and the fortifications bill goes to the Committee on Appropriations and to the same committee in this body. The committees on Appropriations in the two bodies of course give the fortifications bill all the care and attention possible, but that bill is of such importance and it requires so much time to fully consider all the requirements of the situation that it should have in one body or the other the consideration of a committee upon that subject-matter. Its situation is peculiar as compared with the other appropriation bills, and especially as compared with the naval bill, in not having such a committee, nor any special, personal, or local interest to look after it. The naval bill in the House is made up by a committee on the subject-matter of the Navy, and one which of course makes a study of its requirements. In the Senate the naval bill goes to the Committee on Appropriations, but with three members of the Committee on Naval Affairs on the Committee on Appropriations and on the subcommittee on the naval bill, constituting a majority of that subcommittee, it is in the hands of its special friends in both bodies.

"As it comes to us it is not probable that it differs materially when reported by the Senator from Maine from the Committee on Appropriations from what it would be if reported by the same Senator from the Committee on Naval Affairs. Thus the naval bill practically receives the consideration of two committees charged with the duty of caring for the Navy, while the poor fortifications bill is left without a special friend, and has only the interest for the public welfare behind it. This accounts largely for the sad condition of decrepitude in which it reaches this body, if it ever reaches it. It has been the bill of all others upon which the individual, combined, and concentrated pangs of economy seem to have been satiated. Is it not, therefore, the duty of the whole body of the Senate to take up this matter earnestly and make amends for past neglect by making such appropriations as will put the work of harbor defense on the basis of progress which its pressing importance demands? What has happened to the fortifications bills is well shown by a comparison between the reduction from estimates that have been made in the naval bills and the reductions from estimates that have been made in the fortifications bills in the last fifteen years. They are as follows, and show that on an average the naval estimates have been cut in these fifteen years less than 15 per cent, while the estimates for fortifications have been cut 65 per cent. In the last three years the discrepancy has been still greater. The reduction from the naval bills averaged only 7½ per cent, while the reductions from the fortifications bills in the same years averaged over 70 per cent, or reductions nearly ten times as great as those from the naval bills. The result is that if continued at the present rate the appropriations for fortifications will put our harbors in a proper state of defense about the middle of the next century, as is shown by the last report of the Secretary of War:

"The naval appropriations have more than doubled in fifteen years and have now reached thirty millions, and will soon reach fifty millions per year if the present rate of increase goes on. So great a naval authority as Admiral Walker, and one naturally and properly wedded to the interests of the Navy, considers that a proper distribution of $100,000,000 for the national defense would be to give sixty millions to land defense and forty millions to the Navy; and yet it is proposed by this bill to provide four battle ships, which will cost when armed and equipped probably more than $25,000,000 and at least two millions per year for maintenance when kept in commission, besides the constant repairs and rapid deterioration. I speak of these things at this time because I believe that whatever we may decide to do in regard to this naval appropriation we should do in reference to what we expect to appropriate for harbor defense, and that the whole Senate should take an especial interest in the matter.

"There is also a romantic side to the Navy, and I will read an editorial from the New York Press of March 3, 1896, which comments upon this phase of the subject:

WHY THE NAVY CAME FIRST.

Appropriation to Congress districts instead of appropriation to departments has been the prime cause both of our lack of shore defenses and our slow progress in sea defenses. The point of sea defenses, i. e., a navy, was the point of least resistance in this long line of local selfishnesses. A national spirit could be roused to pierce that line. It could be roused by the glorious traditions of the Navy, of which the heavy artillery, at least, of the Army has few. Local pride could be tickled, and was, by a system of naming the new ships after State capitals and big inland towns.

These in some instances acknowledged the compliment far more graciously than did their seaboard sisters. The system of distributing the building of ships among the States was pushed to the extreme of having a torpedo boat constructed in the middle of the continent—Dubuque, Iowa—which exhausted its usefulness in reaching its edge—New London—and has since been harmless enough to accord with a set of chamber of commerce resolutions. Vessels have been sent to take part in local festivities as far from their native brine as Memphis, Tenn. Squadrons have participated in three international parades—two at New York and one at Kiel. An ocean race against time has been made by one of the two crack cruisers, a brick battle ship was set up at the World's Fair, and, in short, we have had in the Navy a continual national circus, for which the people have been willing to pay.

On the other hand, it has been possible to bring not one of these perhaps meretricious aids to the cause of coast defense. We have no doubt that the one courageous Congress which has essayed the subject—the Fiftieth, of glorious memory—would in its separate and individual heart of hearts have preferred to split the award for 100 guns up among a hundred Congress districts than to pour the whole of it into one Pennsylvania constituency. Moreover, whatever of poetry there was in shore defenses has gone with the usefulness of the frowning old stone fortresses, heavily symbolic of Federal might. There is nothing impressive in a modern "fort," a mere hole in the ground, a burrow for a disappearing gun carriage. There has not even been an excursionists' interest in the work at Sandy Hook, where who can forget the veritable hundreds and thousands of sightseers who have rushed to the North River front at the promise of a naval gala day!

Such are some of the reasons why naval betterment has preceded the more strictly necessary work of coast defense.

"Some may think this article attaches too great weight to the effect of poetic sentiment in securing large appropriations for the Navy, but there is much truth in it.

"As another influence that has aided appropriations for the Navy, it might be added there are also great contracting firms and corporations, represented by honorable gentlemen; but it is obvious that these contractors, expending vast sums of money and desiring to show the excellent character of their work, do create and stimulate public sentiment in favor of ships. On the other hand, as stated in the article just read, there is nothing about the modern fortifications to stir poetic sentiment, but there is the plain, practical fact, that they make us safe from attack, and are what we need first and most. Neither have they the interest of great contractors behind them; but the money for them will all be expended in this country and will be much more generally distributed and a much greater proportion of it be expended for labor.

"Whatever we may think of the advisability of harbor defense, there can be no doubt of the sentiment of the country at large upon the subject. There has recently been considerable newspaper comment upon it, and it is invariably favorable to fortifying our harbors.

"The following papers, and many others, have within the last six weeks declared themselves in favor of a modern system of coast defense: New York Tribune, New York Press, Brooklyn Eagle, Chicago Tribune, San Francisco Examiner, Boston Journal, Providence (R. I.) Telegram, Baltimore Herald, St. Louis Post-Dispatch, Louisville Commercial, Woonsocket (R. I.) Reporter, Newark (N. J.) News, Washington Evening Times, Pittsburg Commercial Gazette, Indianapolis Sentinel, Norwich (Conn.) Record, Tampa (Fla.) Times, Bay City (Mich.) Tribune, New York Sun, New York Herald, New York Commercial-Advertiser, New York Journal, New York Times, Binghamton (N. Y.) Republican, Philadelphia Press, Hartford (Conn.) Courant, New York Advertiser, Kansas City Star, Milwaukee Sentinel, Bethlehem (Pa.) Times.

"As I believe the newspapers so well reflect the public sentiment, I will read some more editorials:

THE NATIONAL DEFENSE.

[From the Commercial Gazette of Pittsburg, Pa., of March 2, 1896.]

The question of the rehabilitation of the Navy was one which excited a good deal of attention ten or a dozen years ago, and the results of the agitation are apparent in the vastly improved condition of that arm of the nation's defense. But we are still far behind Great Britain in the magnitude and effectiveness of our Navy, and there is a constant demand for additional expenditures in that direction. * * * No one in this country pretends that we should have a navy equal in prowess to that of Great Britain, but we should spend a great deal more money in seacoast defenses than we have been doing. * * * The United States does not need a great navy, able to cope with those of the leading maritime powers of Europe, mainly for the reason that this is not an aggressive nation and does not expect to engage in aggressive warfare. * * * There is no telling when the nation might be made to feel the consequences of this neglect. An attack from a foreign naval fleet is improbable, but not impossible. The Venezuelan affair and the Cuban insurrection furnish pointers as to what might happen very unexpectedly. There is little fear that in the end the United States would be able to hold its own against all comers, but in doing so no little humiliation and loss would be endured. The best way to render such attacks impossible would be to be fully prepared to repel them.

ECONOMY OF COAST DEFENSES.

[From the Washington Evening Times of February 27, 1896.]

If the United States were to get into a war with Great Britain, or France, or Russia, or any other foreign power having a considerable navy, a fleet of hostile vessels could do damage enough by a day's bombardment of one of our great seaport cities to more than equal the total cost of a complete system of defenses on the Atlantic, Pacific, and lake coasts. It is the same foolish policy from which many inland towns have suffered that have shunned the expense of a well-equipped fire department and lost more money by one conflagration than the whole outfit would have cost.

A perfect system of coast defenses is notice to the world that the country possessing them fears no attack from hostile fleets and has its own navy free to operate wherever its services may be most valuable. Its first cost is the chief outlay; it has not to be added to, nor have any parts of it to be replaced; it is there for all time. On the other hand, vessels wear out; they have to be overhauled and repaired; it takes time to get them ready for active service after once they have been out of commission. A modern fortification, built upon the best models, is practically indestructible, for the guns that can be mounted on it are so far-reaching as to keep even battle ships at such a distance that their shells can not reach the city back of the defenses.

THE OLD WAY THE BETTER.

[From the Boston Journal of February 27, 1896.]

It is a matter for patriotic congratulation that the important bill of Senator SQUIRE providing for the systematic expenditure of $67,000,000 for coast defense has been favorably considered and reported to Congress.

It is a significant fact that the objection of a need of economy, which has been fatal this session to many deserving bills, has not been raised against this measure. Though it authorizes a heavy appropriation, the actual expenditure will be distributed over a series of years, and therefore can not overtax the national resources. Eighty-seven million dollars is a large sum, but it is only a little more than a dollar a head of our immense population—by no means an extravagant price to pay for an effective form of national insurance.

As a matter of fact, it is a far smaller sum than the Government in its days of comparative weakness expended to build and equip the really admirable system of coast defenses which we possessed prior to the war of the rebellion. Our fathers were poorer than we, but they created and maintained fortifications which commanded the respect of Europe and kept us for almost half a century free from serious menace by the great military powers of the Old World.

Our present relatively unprotected condition is a modern innovation—a departure from the traditional policy of the Republic—and the American people have given abundant proof that they want no more of such a rash experiment.

COAST DEFENSES.

[From the Woonsocket (R. I.) Reporter of February 29, 1896.]

England has at present 60 armed battle ships to our 8, and is going to build 10 more this year, while there are murmurs at the proposed addition of 6 battle ships to our Navy. It is necessary to provide strong land defenses under the protection of which our ships could take shelter when menaced by an overwhelming hostile force, or refit in case of necessity.

There is no doubt that the great majority of the people of the United States favor arbitration as the best method of adjusting international disputes, and the views of many good citizens are reflected in the opposition of a leading Boston paper to the appropriation of any money for coast defenses as wasteful and unnecessary. Such optimistic peace lovers have forgotten the immortal maxim of Washington, "In time of peace prepare for war," and need to remember that the continued absence of fire does not prove the folly of insurance. The example of China shows the helplessness of a great commercial nation with enormous population and unlimited resources, but without any efficient protection from hostile attack, when suddenly assailed by an energetic foe, far inferior in size, but provided with a sting.

The expenditure of $87,000,000 in ten years would not add materially to the burden of the American people, and would build all the forts needed to protect our great seacoast cities. The appropriation of that sum by Congress for such a purpose would tend to perpetuate an honorable peace with all nations. Those who are opposed to taking any precautions against the dangers which but yesterday overwhelmed China should remember that, as Professor Hollis said in his admirable lecture in Boston this week, we are living in the nineteenth century, not the twenty-fifth.

THE DEFENSE OF OUR COASTS.

[From the New York Journal of February 29, 1896.]

If we leave our coasts unprotected we shall furnish an isolated example of a nation which believes itself above the need of land defenses of the modern pattern. The natural result will be that at some unexpected moment we shall receive an unpleasant lesson, the record of which it will not be agreeable to place in our archives.

We have entered upon an epoch of international questions. Each month brings its quota of foreign matters in which we are interested, and from which we can not hold aloof as we did of old. We need to speak our minds freely, and now and then to declare our policy imperatively. It must be clear to most thinking men that we shall not be listened to with absolute respect if by our negligence we invite successful attack. There was a time when England's "white sea wall" was inadequately defended, and when the Continental powers, just entering upon the period of monstrous armaments, pretended not to listen when she spoke. But when England girdled her island coast with steel and iron, and made it so that an enemy, were he as brave as William the Conqueror, could not land anywhere without receiving the converging fire of two gigantic forts, they were somewhat more attentive.

In arming our coasts we are not merely providing against the possibility of a national humiliation. We are strengthening our position on every international topic upon which we are obliged to declare ourselves. We want more guns, built in the Government foundries and in private establishments, also at a rate which will enable us to show satisfactory progress in defense. This powerful nation can afford the cost of a full equipment of every defensible point. It can not afford to neglect the matter another year. At this very hour questions are pending which might bring on hostilities with nations possessing powerful navies. This fact alone should plead eloquently for haste and thoroughness in arming the coasts.

OUR COAST DEFENSES.

[From the Sentinel, of Indianapolis, Ind., March 4, 1896.]

The question of expending money for a navy or expending it for coast defenses is one that is forcing itself more and more on the minds of men who are working on the problem of defense against foreign attack. Of course, both are needed to a certain degree, but there must be a limit somewhere to our Navy, and it may very properly be doubted that there is good policy in attempting to build up and maintain a navy equal to that of any of the great powers of Europe. At present our Navy rates not higher than sixth or seventh in the list of the navies of the world, although it has cost over a hundred millions of dollars, and it is very far surpassed by the best ones. At the same time it is conceded that it is not adequate for the defense of our coasts, and, indeed, not adequate for defense of any material portion of them. Practically, we can be attacked only on our coasts, but an immense amount of damage could be inflicted there by a strong naval force.

It is hardly practicable to attempt to keep up in a race of this kind when we have comparatively little use for a large navy, and when these countries are adding to their navies as fast as we can. But we can protect our coasts against any naval force that can be brought against them. Such is the opinion of such men as General Abbot, Admiral Walker, and other military and naval experts.

On every ground, therefore, reason would dictate that we turn our attention especially to coast defenses, at least until the country is put in condition in which there would be no occasion for fear of damage from foreign attack.

"I shall vote for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maryland not because I feel any hostility to the Navy nor because I underrate its importance, but because the fortifications bill is so much more entitled to our consideration at this time as being the first provision in the logical development of our national defenses. I believe that it can but be apparent to the Senate that the fortifications bill is of more importance than the provisions for the increase of the Navy at this time, and that it should receive preference if we do not intend to pass both. It will meet the general approval of the country, regardless of the condition of our revenues, to establish and declare the policy that the protection of our own country is our first duty. If we have not the money in hand, we surely will have it. If we can afford to build four battle ships per year, for eight years, we can certainly afford to use one-half the money they will cost to make our harbors safe for them and to protect our cities. This amount, the cost of two battle ships, is not an extravagant or unreasonable appropriation for coast defenses.

"I would rather have no appropriation at all than to have the usual poor excuse for one. If we have none at all, the sentiment of the country will soon be so aroused as to compel a well-defined policy, while our annual apology might otherwise postpone such action for a time. Let us adhere to the traditional policy of the United States—we want the means of defense, not aggression."

I have quoted these very pertinent views of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR] as setting forth fully my ideas with regard to the necessity of coast defenses, but I do not agree with him that we may not appropriate for the four battle ships and at the same time make adequate appropriations for our coast defenses. I believe that the Senate and that both Houses of Congress are ready to do so, and that the people are ready to sustain them.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President—

Mr. CHANDLER. Will it be convenient for the Senator from Maine to allow me to offer an amendment to the bill at this time?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. CHANDLER. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PEPPER in the chair). The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the bill the following:

That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby directed to examine, through a board composed of line and staff officers, into the merits of any system presented for the propulsion of vessels by direct action against the water without the use of screws, in comparison with the steam engine and the propeller, and into the relative efficiency of the two methods as to displacement, waste of fuel, liability to accidents, and speed endurance, and also into the applicability and special advantages of the direct system in connection with torpedo boats and coast-defense vessels.

Mr. TURPIE. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of House bill 5853, a pension bill, which will not lead to any debate.

Mr. CHANDLER. Let my amendment be adopted first, if there be no objection. I move the amendment for adoption at this time.

Mr. PASCO. I suggest that the Senate is rather thin to adopt an amendment so important. There may be some experiments—

Mr. CHANDLER. There is no objection to the amendment going over at the suggestion of the Senator from Florida.

Mr. HALE. Let it go over, then.

Mr. PASCO. I wish to say before it goes over that I wish to bring up the amendment relating to the establishment of a tank, and perhaps the amendment the Senator from New Hampshire has offered may have some connection with that.

Mr. CHANDLER. No; it has no relation to the tank.

Mr. HALE. There is no necessity for any amendment to be offered in regard to the tank. The provision was placed in the bill by the other House.

Mr. PASCO. It was in the bill, but it has been stricken out, I understand.

Mr. HALE. No amendment is required, but simply a vote.

Mr. PASCO. I wish to have the vote reconsidered or the question brought up after the bill is reported to the Senate.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator can have the amendment striking out that provision reserved for a separate vote in the Senate.

ARMINDA STUCKER.

Mr. TURPIE. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5853) granting a pension to Arminda Stucker, of Gallatin, Mo.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Mrs. Arminda Stucker, widow of John H. Stucker, late a soldier in Company B, Grundy County Battalion, Missouri State Militia, at the rate of $12 per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 57 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, April 30, 1896, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, April 29, 1896.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1904) to regulate marriages in the District of Columbia, asked a conference with the House on the bill and amendments, and had appointed Mr. FAULKNER, Mr. McMILLAN, and Mr. GALLINGER as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 888) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Capital Railway Company," approved March 2, 1895, asked a conference with the House on the bill and amendments, and had appointed Mr. McMILLAN, Mr. FAULKNER, and Mr. PROCTOR as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 7664) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes, had agreed to the conference asked by the House of Representatives, and had appointed Mr. ALLISON, Mr. HALE, and Mr. GORMAN as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

GETTYSBURG NATIONAL PARK.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2490) to authorize the Secretary of War to improve and maintain the public roads within the limits of the national park at Gettysburg, Pa.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized in his discretion to improve and maintain the public roads within the limits of the national park at Gettysburg, Pa., over which jurisdiction has been or may hereafter be ceded to the United States: Provided, That nothing contained in this act shall be deemed and held to prejudice the rights acquired by any State or by any military organization to the ground on which its monuments or markers are placed nor the right of way to the same.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Mr. Speaker, I can state more briefly than the report the provisions of this bill. It simply authorizes the Secretary of War to construct and repair roads within the limits of the Gettysburg National Park. It carries no appropriation. The bill passed the Senate and is unanimously reported from the Committee on Military Affairs. The amendment to the Gettysburg Park act is stated in the following words:

That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized in his discretion to improve and maintain the public roads within the limits of the national park at Gettysburg, Pa., over which jurisdiction has been or may hereafter be ceded to the United States.

Mr. SAYERS. If this bill should become a law, would it interfere with the plans devised by the Department?

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Not at all.

Mr. SAYERS. You remember that in the last Congress we passed a bill making the battlefield of Gettysburg a national park. I believe that General Sickles reported the bill.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. It complies fully with the regulations heretofore adopted and the acts of Congress relating to this park, as provided in the map of General Sickles.

Mr. DINGLEY. Does not the Secretary of War have this authority now?

Mr. CURTIS of New York. No, sir.

Mr. McMILLIN. Has this bill been submitted to the Secretary of War?

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Yes.

Mr. McMILLIN. What is his report on it? Let us have the report read.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. I will read his letter. It is as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington, D. C., March 2, 1896.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith copy of letter from the Gettysburg National Park Commission, dated February 19, 1896, together with copy of proposed amendment to section 4 of the act entitled "An act to establish a national park at Gettysburg, Pa.," approved February 11, 1895, and to advise you that the proposed amendment meets with the concurrence of this Department.

Very respectfully,

DANIEL S. LAMONT,
Secretary of War.

THE SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

There is no objection to this bill from any source whatever.

Mr. McMILLIN. I will ask for the rereading of the bill. There was confusion and I was unable to hear it.

The bill was again read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LOUD. I should like to ask the gentleman if he has any idea what is going to be the probable cost?

Mr. CURTIS of New York. I can not give you the information. There is no appropriation asked for in this bill.

Mr. LOUD. Oh, of course not.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. It comes out of the appropriation already made.

Mr. LOUD. Of course it will have to come out of the regular appropriations made annually for parks all over the country.

Mr. BINGHAM. There is an appropriation of $50,000 in the sundry civil appropriation bill.

Mr. LOUD. Oh, I know this will have to be met in the sundry civil bill. We are getting parks all over the country and we are piling up permanent expenses every year. There will have to be a halt somewhere, either on pensions or on roads, one or the other.

Mr. DOCKERY. I suggest to the gentleman from California that it is considered ungracious to propose a reduction of expenses here.

Mr. LOUD. Oh, perhaps so, but I can not help it.

Mr. McMILLIN. I will ask the gentleman from New York if the Government has complete jurisdiction over that park?

Mr. CURTIS of New York. It has.

Mr. McMILLIN. Has the land been bought by the Government, or ceded to it?

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Yes; this only relates to that which has been ceded, and is so specified in the bill.

Mr. BAILEY. Does the gentleman from New York mean to say that the Government of the United States has exclusive jurisdiction?

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Yes; the State of Pennsylvania has granted jurisdiction, in respect to this park, over the territory that the Government desires to occupy. The map has been made, the bill establishing the park was approved on the 11th of February, 1895, and the State of Pennsylvania has ceded jurisdiction.

Mr. McMILLIN. But the gentleman from Texas will observe that there are reserved rights over which, it seems, the Government has no control.

Mr. CURTIS of New York (reading):

Over which jurisdiction has been or may hereafter be ceded to the United States.

That is, for any extensions to the park that may be made in the future.

Mr. McMILLIN. But there seems to be a reservation of rights. I will ask the Clerk to read the proviso.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. I will read it:

Provided, That nothing contained in this act shall be deemed and held to prejudice the rights acquired by any State or by any military organization to the ground on which its monuments or markers are placed, nor the right of way to the same.

Now, you must understand that the land for the park has been ceded by the State of Pennsylvania, and has been accepted by the Government. The plans were drawn under the supervision of General Sickles. The State of Pennsylvania has granted, with the concurrence of Congress, the right to put up monuments on various parts of the field by organizations from different States that were engaged in the battle. This bill provides that these monuments shall not in any case be encroached on by these roads.

Mr. KEM. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Who keeps up the public roads there now?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. KEM. I object.

EXTRA COPIES OF HOUSE BILL RELATING TO PACIFIC RAILROADS.

Mr. FARIS. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Committee on Pacific Railroads, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the House 2,500 extra copies of House bill 6186, and a like number of the majority and minority reports of the Committee on Pacific Railroads thereon.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The resolution was agreed to.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE—THORP VS. M'KENNEY.

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to present the report of the Committee on Elections No. 3 on the contested-election case of Thorp against McKenney from the Fourth Congressional district of Virginia; and I ask that it be printed.

Mr. DE ARMOND (some time subsequently). Mr. Speaker, in the case of Thorp against McKenney I, present the conclusions of certain members of the Committee on Elections No. 3, and ask that they be printed with the report presented by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WALKER] in the same case. It is really a concurrent report. There is no difference as to the result, but expresses the views of certain members of the committee.

The report, with the views of the minority, was ordered to be printed, and referred to the House Calendar.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE—PEARCE AGAINST BELL.

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I present the report of the Committee on Elections No. 3 in the case of Giles Otis Pearce vs. John C. Bell, from the Second Congressional district of the State of Colorado, and ask immediate action upon this report. As it is but a few lines, there is no need of asking that it be printed.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Elections No. 3, to which was referred the contested election case of Giles Otis Pearce against John C. Bell, from the Second Congressional district of the State of Colorado, submits the following report:

In this case the contestant gave no notice of contest, as required by law, and has taken no evidence to sustain the allegations of fraud and intimidation claimed by him to have been committed.

The official returns show that the contestant received 47,703 votes; that Thomas M. Bowen received 42,369 votes; that W. A. Rice received 2,632 votes, and the contestant received 157 votes.

The committee therefore recommends the adoption of the following resolutions:

Resolved, That Giles Otis Pearce was not elected a Representative in the Fifty-fourth Congress from the Second Congressional district of the State of Colorado, and is not entitled to a seat therein.

Resolved, That John C. Bell was duly elected a Representative in the Fifty-fourth Congress from the Second Congressional district of the State of Colorado, and is entitled to a seat therein.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolutions. The resolutions were agreed to.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE—HOGUE VS. OTEY.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker, I present the report of the Committee on Elections No. 3 in the contested-election case of J. Hampton Hogue vs. Peter J. Otey, from the Sixth Congressional district of Virginia. I ask that it be printed and referred to the House Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The report will be ordered printed and the case referred to the House Calendar.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the thanks of Congress be given to the people of Wisconsin for the statue of James Marquette, the renowned missionary explorer and discoverer of the Mississippi River.

Resolved, That the statue be accepted, to remain in the National Statuary Hall, and that a copy of these resolutions, signed by the presiding officers of the Senate and House of Representatives, be forwarded to his excellency the governor of the State of Wisconsin.

UNITED STATES COURTS, ROANOKE, VA.

Mr. OTEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 7668) to establish a term of the district and circuit courts of the United States at Roanoke, Va., in the western district of Virginia.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That a term of the district and circuit courts of the United States shall be held in each year at Roanoke, in the western district of Virginia, on the Tuesday after the second Monday in February and August.

Sec. 2. That the counties of Roanoke, Botetourt, Giles, Craig, Franklin, Montgomery, Floyd, Pulaski, Tazewell, Bland, and Carroll, and city of Roanoke shall be attached to the division of the court established by the first section of this act, and all process running to said counties shall be returnable to said counties.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

There was no objection.

Amendments recommended by the Committee on the Judiciary were adopted, as follows:

Section 2, line 3, strike out the words "city of Roanoke."

Section 2, line 3, strike out the word "counties" and insert "courts."

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. OTEY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LIGHT-HOUSE AT ORIENT POINT, LONG ISLAND, ETC.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House bill No. 853, providing for the erection of a light-house at Orient Point, Long Island, New York, and for the proper lighting of the entrances to Greenport and Sag Harbor, and the west shore of Shelter Island.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Light-House Board is hereby authorized and directed to erect a light-house at the site of the beacon heretofore existing at Orient Point, or Oyster Pond Reef, on the west side of Plum Gut, at the entrance of Long Island Sound, in the State of New York, and the said Board shall also erect beacon lights or gas buoys at the following points in the county of Suffolk, N. Y.:

First. On Hay Beach Point, Shelter Island.

Second. At the end of the Greenport breakwater, Greenport.

Third. On Conkings Point, about 2 miles west of Greenport.

Fourth. On Rocky or Stearns Point, on Shelter Island.

Fifth. On Hallocks or Paradise Point, on Great Hog Neck, opposite Shelter Island.

Sixth. On Tyndalls Point or Clarks Point, north of Sag Harbor.

Seventh. On the shore south of West Neck Harbor, on Shelter Island.

Eighth. On the shoal about three-fourths of a mile north of the Sag Harbor wharf, Long Island.

Sec. 2. That the sum of $55,000, to be available immediately, is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of constructing and placing the foregoing light-house, beacons, and buoys.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I observe that there is no limitation in the bill as to the expenditure.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. I do not know that I caught the reading of the bill accurately, but if I did it seems to be an omnibus bill.

Mr. McCORMICK. Oh, no. The other items in the bill in addition to the light-house are for small gas buoys.

Mr. DOCKERY. I should like to hear the report.

Mr. McCORMICK. I will ask the Clerk to read the report.

The report (by Mr. CORLISS) was read, as follows:
